Mr. LE BLOND. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail, and I think that if he will look at the matter for a single moment he will see that his proposition would destroy the efficiency of the bill, and for this reason: the object of the bill is not to pay Mr. Sweetzer, but for the purpose of indemnifying the parties who were the purchasers under the Government. I suppose these parties paid $2 50 an acre for their lands, for a portion of them had been given to the State of Ohio for the purpose of building a canal. Ohio retained the alternate sections. A part of the lands were bought from the Government directly at $2 50 an acre. The balance of the lands, was purchased from the State at the same rate. Now, if Mr. Sweetzer's judgment creditor, who can now oust the parties in possession, is willing to accept $2 50 an acre, that will be perfectly satisfactory to the present holders of these lands. They do not care anything about it, but Mr. Sweetzer, I apprehend, would be unwilling to take that; and why? Simply because he would be receiving $2 50 an acre when the lands are really worth more. The object of the bill is to leave these parties in possession of the lands which they have already improved. I think it is but simple justice on the part of the General Government to make these parties whole, and let them retain the lands they have already improved. The Government, in the first place, sold the lands when they had no title to them and ought not to have sold them. But having sold them and got $2 50 an acre, the gentleman proposes to pay back that sum without even interest. It seems to me that that would be injustice to these parties, and that the amendment ought not to prevail. I hope the bill will pass in the shape in which it comes from the committee, and when the commission shall have gone upon the land and assessed the value of it in an unimproved condition, the case will come before the House for future action in making an appropriation.

Mr. THAYER. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and LE BLOND.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. THAYER demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Lindsay vs. Scott. I ask for the reading of the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That John G. Scott is entitled to retain his seat in this House as a Representative from the third congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House by any speech on this case. Mr. Scott is not present, owing to sickness in his family; and at this stage of the session it is not necessary to postpone the case on his account. The Committee of Elections were unanimous in this report. I will say that if the contestant had prepared his evidence in better shape and more precisely, the result might have been different. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to James Lindsay, in full for time spent and expenses incurred in contesting the right of John G. Scott to a seat in this House as a Representative from the third congressional district of Missouri, the usual mileage of a member for one session, and like monthly compensation from the commencement of the session to the date of the passage of this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether there was any division of the committee in this case?

Mr. DAWES. The committee were unanimous in the report made in this case; but the committee were also unanimous that the contestant acted in good faith, and that there was good ground for contest.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that this resolution ought to go to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I am directed by the committee to submit this resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for the purpose of moving to insert the name of John S. Sleeper, of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that I can yield, acting as I am under the instructions of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MALLORY. Does not the gentleman know that there was more ground for Mr. Sleeper contesting the right to a seat of his colleague, Mr. Rice, than for Mr. Lindsay to contest the seat of Mr. Scott, of Missouri?

Mr. DAWES. I was in favor of granting compensation to Mr. Sleeper, and I urged his case upon the House, but the House rejected the resolution. I can hardly permit the amendment to come in now.

Mr. STEVENS. Has not the Sleeper case been adjudicated?

Mr. DAWES. It strikes me so. I wish the House had voted differently.

Mr. GANSON. As a member of the Committee of Elections I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to let the amendment come in.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question I will renew it.

Mr. DAWES. If I were not situated as I am

I would permit the amendment to come in. My opinion is that the House did not do right by Mr. Sleeper. If the House desires to vote on the amendment it can vote down the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 57.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAWES and MALLORY were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-nine, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to insert the name of John S. Sleeper, of Massachusetts, and that he shall receive both pay and mileage up to the date of the decision of his case.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I will say a word with the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky. It seems to me these contested-election cases should be settled differently and definitely. As it is these contestants receive more pay than the members who sit here during the entire session. I do not object to compensating a man who has a good case of contest, but I would not pay them more than members who come here and remain every day for six and seven months. If we are absent we have eight dollars a day deducted from our pay during that absence. Take the case of Mr. Sleeper. He has not been here for many months. So with the contestants whose cases were acted upon the other day. They receive pay whether they are here or not. There should be a different plan adopted in regard to them. They have been here thick and fast at this Congress, and they may be thicker at the next Congress, and we are paying these congressional districts for two members more than the compensation that we receive. If this resolution could be amended in such a way that a fair amount shall be paid to them, I shall have no objection.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask for the reading of the resolution as I propose to amend it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to James Lindsay and John S. Sleeper, in full for time spent and expenses incurred while contesting the right of John G. Scott and Alexander H. Rice to seats in this House of Representatives, respectively, from the third congressional district of Missouri and the third district of Massachusetts, the usual mileage of a member for one session, and like monthly compensation from the commencement of the session to the date of the passage of the resolutions declaring them not entitled to seats.

Mr. MALLORY. That is the shape in which I wish the resolution submitted to the House. I will say to the gentleman from New York, before I call the previous question, that I would cheerfully agree to any arrangement by which justice and fairness could be arrived at in every case of this kind. I think, myself, we have acted precipitately in many cases, and have sometimes given more than the individuals were entitled to properly, and in some cases less. If the Committee of Elections will introduce some resolution prescribing a rule for the action of the House in cases of this kind, I will very cheerfully consider that resolution in the light of the best information I can bring to bear upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he modify his amendment so as to require the same deduction to be made for absence as is made in reference to members of Congress.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not suppose that matter could very well be arrived at. These gentlemen certainly were not in the House every day. Their presence in the House is not required at all. They may have been in Washington, but out of the House, preparing testimony in their cases, and working as industriously as if they had been in the Hall.

Mr. WILSON. It would be considered as constructive presence if they were engaged in preparing their cases. In one of the cases from Missouri—the case of Price vs. McClurg—Price received a very large amount, and yet he was not here attending to his case one third of the time for which he was paid. I do not think we ought to give full pay in cases of that kind.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to say that in the case of Scott and Lindsay the parties were engaged one or two months in taking testimony during the session, and since that time Mr. Lindsay has been here, I believe, in attendance up to within a very few days. By a stipulation between him and the sitting member the time for taking testimony was extended, so that January and February were consumed in that matter. In that manner it happened that testimony was taken during the session.

In reference to the case of Sleeper, I voted to pay him when the matter was formerly before the House, considering that he made the contest in good faith, as I think Lindsay did. I conceive that had Lindsay prepared his case with more care, and made it more specific, he might perhaps have produced a different result, but as the evidence stood there was no other conclusion to which the committee could come. The committee, therefore, consider that he prosecuted his claim in good faith, and is entitled to the compensation under the rule, which is to pay mileage and a monthly compensation of $250 from the commencement of the session. I believe Lindsay reduced the majority of the sitting member down to sixty, thus making it a very close case.

Mr. STEVENS. I raise a point of order on the resolution. I think we have a rule of this House explicitly providing that when a subject has been once acted upon it shall not be again acted upon by the same Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that that rule applies to a resolution indefinitely postponed. That could not be called up and acted upon by the House, but it could if it came up in a different shape. This resolution provides a different compensation from the former one.

Mr. MALLORY. I demand the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon Mr. MALLORY's amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 66, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Goehel, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—68.

NAVS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilson, and Win-dom—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Brandegee, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, English, Grinnell, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Kasson, Kelley, King, Loan, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Pendleton, Perry, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 59, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Ganson, Goehel, Grider, Hale, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Law, Lazear, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, James E. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Atwood, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Furnsworth, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Edward B. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blair, Boyd, Brandegee, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Briggs, Dumont, English, Fenton, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Kasson, Kelley, King, Le Blond, Loan, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—52.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. ODELL asked the consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to report a bill which shall fix a proper scale of compensation for contestants to seats in this body, the provisions of which shall fully indemnify for expenses actually incurred in presenting their claims to seats, but not to affect any who may now be claimants.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that private business be dispensed with for the balance of the day for the purpose of taking up the Pacific railroad bill.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the report of the Committee of Elections upon the military appointments of members of this House. I ask that the resolutions reported from the committee may be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Robert C. Schenck, having resigned the office of major general of volunteers, which he then held, on the 13th day of November, 1863, whose resignation was accepted November 21, 1863, to take effect December 5, 1863, was not, by reason of having held such office, disqualified from holding a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, whose first session commenced on the 7th day of December, 1863.

Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., by continuing to hold the office of major general of volunteers, to which he was appointed November 29, 1862, and to discharge the duties thereof till January 1, 1864, the date of his resignation, did thereby decline and disqualify himself to hold the office of Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the first session of which commenced on the 1st Monday in December, 1863.

Mr. DAWES. I now ask the previous question on the resolutions, unless some gentleman proposes to debate them.

Mr. STEVENS. It seems to me that a very important principle is involved in the resolutions which have been reported from the Committee of Elections, reversing the established practice of the House heretofore. I do not know at any rate why the committee should have brought before the House the case of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] There is no contest in reference to the seat held by him here. His name has not been mentioned at all in this connection except in a communication from the President incidentally, as coupled with that of another gentleman, but there has no question been raised in reference to his seat. Now, as to the other question which has been decided by the Committee of Elections, that the seats of members of this House should be vacated in consequence of holding military commissions, I had supposed that the principle had been followed that a person elected as a member of this House could properly continue to hold a commission as an officer in the volunteer force until he was sworn in as a member of Congress, or that he might hold it until he had made his election whether he would hold the commission or the seat, but that when he came here and took his seat as a member of Congress he would vacate his commission.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he does not think a man makes his election when he exercises the duties of his office?

Mr. STEVENS. I do. I think the very moment a man takes his seat here in the House he is no longer a major general.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Suppose he was exercising the duties of major general on the 4th of March when the Congress commenced, would that vacate his right as a member of Congress?

Mr. STEVENS. I will reply to the gentleman if I can have the opportunity.

Mr. DAWES. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the report of the Committee of Elections upholds his opinion precisely. The gentleman will excuse me for saying that if he had read the report of the committee he would not object to the resolutions we have reported.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not know that it was to be called up to-day, and have not read the report.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to press this report against the wish of the House, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any gentleman desires its postponement.

Mr. STEVENS. I would prefer that some time should be given for its consideration. It involves a great principle.

Mr. DAWES. It does involve a great principle, and one that ought to be settled.

Mr. STEVENS. I should prefer time to consider for a few days.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know when that few days will end at this stage of the session. If the House will grant a reasonable time to dispose of the matter hereafter, that is all I want.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the gentleman from Massachusetts can call his resolution up any time as a question of privilege.

Mr. DAWES. Very well, I will call it up on Monday at one o'clock.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to dispense with private business for the remainder of the day for the purpose of taking up the Pacific railroad bill.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the contested-election case of Kline and Myers. I suppose it will consume but little time in disposing of it, and the parties are both anxious to have it disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. Does that prevent a motion before the House from being put?

The SPEAKER. It does. It is a question of privilege affecting the right of members to their seats in this House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask that the report and resolutions may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of John Kline, contesting the right of Hon. Leonard Myers to a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as a Representative from the third district of the State of Pennsylvania, and praying to be admitted to the same himself, having considered the same, and the evidence submitted in reference thereto, respectfully submit the following report:

The contestant, by his own acknowledgment, has failed to substantiate the specifications or charges contained in his notice of contest by any evidence he has been able to lay before the committee, and it is therefore unnecessary to make any statement of the facts in the case. He, however, furnishes satisfactory evidence that he had made an unsuccessful effort to procure a recount of the ballots within the sixty days allowed for the taking of depositions, and before the officers selected for that purpose. And upon his showing this fact, and upon his further suggestion that the result of a recount might possibly differ from the first, he bases an application for an order from this House to send for the boxes and recount the votes.

The committee were of opinion that such an application should be founded upon some proof, sufficient, at least, to raise a presumption of mistake, irregularity, or fraud in the original count, and ought not to be granted upon the mere suggestion of possible error. The contestant failed to furnish such proof. On the contrary, so far as appeared by the evidence presented to the committee, the election was conducted with perfect good order and fairness throughout the day, and at the close the votes were carefully and accurately counted, the officers participating therein being nearly equally divided in their political alliances. The list of voters, tally papers, and returns, were properly made out and disposed of according to law. There is nowhere in the evidence a reasonable suspicion of wrong. To adopt a rule that the ballot-boxes should be opened upon the mere request of the defeated candidate would occasion more fraud than it could possibly expose. The number of ballot-boxes in each congressional district is seldom less than fifty, and often more than two hundred. They are usually left in the care of a magistrate or some township officer, by whom they are deposited in no safer place than an upper shelf in a public office.

The opportunities of tampering with the boxes thus scattered through the district would be abundant; and if it was known in advance that a second count could be had without discrediting the first, the temptation to do so would be strong. It makes no difference in settling the rule, that in this particular case the votes had been carefully guarded by the mayor and recorder, under a special law for the city of Philadelphia. That fact would only strengthen the confidence in the result of a recount in this case, but does not show the propriety of establishing a general rule authorizing a recount whenever asked. It should be remembered that the fact sought is not what the ballot-boxes contain six months or a year after the election, but what they did contain after the last vote was deposited on the day of election. Certainly an impartial, accurate, and public count, then, by the sworn officers of the law, would be better evidence of that fact than any subsequent count not more impartial and not presumed to be more accurate than the first, and after the boxes had been long exposed to the tampering of dishonest partisans. The adoption of such a practice would be equivalent to setting aside the first count altogether, and it ought on that principle to be dispensed with, and the ballots sent to this House instead of certificates.

The rule adopted by the committee is in accordance with the universal practice of courts of justice, where a new trial or a rehearing is never granted except upon proof of probable error in the first, in accordance with the rulings in several contested-election cases decided in the courts of the State from which this contest comes, and believed not to be in conflict with any precedent of this House.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That John Kline is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That Leonard Myers is entitled to the seat now occupied by him as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] whether he designs to allow discussion on these resolutions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I propose to move the previous question after the parties have said what they may have to say. I do not intend to discuss it myself.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I cannot allow this report to be passed upon by the House without expressing my dissent from the position assumed by the Committee of Elections. There is a law in Pennsylvania for the safe-keeping of the ballot-boxes, and they have been so guarded under that law. The only manner in which the contestant could possibly prove the frauds which he alleges, and which a large portion of the community believe were committed, was in examining these boxes; and the committee refused to give him that privilege. Hence the committee cut off the only means by which he could prove his case. There was in this election only a majority of 45 or 46; and I doubt not that if the contestant had had the opportunity he would have been able to show that he was duly elected, and was clearly entitled to his seat. This being denied him, I must offer my protest thereto.

Mr. STILES. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee is predicated on the statement that no preliminary evidence had been submitted to the committee authorizing it to direct a recount of these ballots. I dissent entirely from the opinion of the committee. I understand that the committee was not unanimous on this question. The act of Congress regulating contested elections was complied with by the contestant, and entitles him to a recount of the ballots without preliminary evidence. In this case the contestant complied with the act of Congress by giving the necessary notice of contest, which, in my judgment, was all that the law required him to do. The laws of Pennsylvania made the mayor and recorder of Philadelphia the joint custodians of these boxes, and the mayor refused to furnish them.

It was argued before the committee by the sitting member that it should be proved, before a recount was ordered, that some mistake or error had been committed, or proof that there was fraud. In deciding the question the committee has assumed the position of the sitting member, and has decided that it could not go into a recount of the ballots without preliminary evidence. I dissent entirely from the views of the committee. The act of Congress requires no such evidence. It simply requires notice to be given of the contest; and notice having been given, the contestant is entitled to the examination of all the papers and ballots, and that has been the uniform course of the committee in contested-election cases. I protest against the conclusion to which the committee has arrived. The report says:

"It should be remembered that the fact sought is not what the ballot-boxes contain six months or a year after the election, but what they did contain after the last vote was deposited on the day of election."

When we remember that the boxes in this case are as secure now as they were when closed by the officers, the position of the committee has not the semblance of argument.

There is another thing in the report of my colleague which I think is not justified by the evidence and facts in the case. It is, that the contestant waives the other matters of contest, besides the question as to the boxes. I did not understand that the contestant waived any point of contest.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood the chairman of the Committee of Elections to ask the gentleman who now has the floor, speaking for Mr. Kline, whether he desired to be heard on any other point than in regard to the ballot-boxes, and I understood the gentleman to say he did not.

Mr. STILES. I told him that I desired to present no other point until this point was decided. The chairman of the Committee of Elections will bear me out as to what I said.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is the way I understood you.

Mr. STILES. I have no doubt that you so understood me. I find no fault. The act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed specially for the city of Philadelphia, enjoins the mayor and recorder of the city to be the custodians of the boxes containing all the ballots cast for all the officers voted for. The boxes were placed in the hands of those officers. They were summoned to appear before the judge who took the testimony. The recorder was willing to have the ballots recounted; but the mayor declined, giving as a reason that the Committee of Elections was the proper tribunal to call for the production of the ballots. I will not read his testimony because it is somewhat lengthy. The question was referred by the mayor to the Committee of Elections, and that committee have declined to open the boxes, upon the ground, as I have said before, that we laid no preliminary ground. I submit that there is evidence in this case which shows some ground for suspicion of fraud at this election.

There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House. These judges assembled and for the purpose of getting the returns from the prothonotary's office they adjourned and some of them left. Immediately afterwards a peremptory mandamus was served upon the judges present and they gave the certificate to the sitting member. That circumstance was sufficient itself to cast suspicion upon this election and return. In addition to that a paper was submitted to the committee, though not an official paper, that the returns of one precinct was omitted, whether intentionally or by mistake I do not know. The slightest evidence of fraud ought to suffice, even if the view of the committee is adopted.

I think that a recount was a matter of justice to the contestant as well as to the sitting member, and I do not see why he should have objected to it.

The gentleman who presented the report of the Committee of Elections referred to the manner in which the ballot-boxes are generally kept in that State. Now the thing complained of was corrected by the law of 1861. The ballot-boxes are so kept there that there is no possibility of tampering with them. No person is allowed to go into the vault where they are kept. The mayor cannot go in there himself without the consent of the recorder. The keys of that vault are held jointly by them. There is nothing therefore in the argument that these boxes may have been tampered with. They may be kept there forever without any probability of their being tampered with. I do not desire to detain the House or I would read the testimony of the mayor. He testifies that these boxes have been safely kept and that they have not been touched since they were deposited there. I would like to know whether the statement in this report is meant to be general, or only to refer to this particular case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If my colleague had noticed the report he would have had his answer. The committee say that it "makes no difference in settling the rule, that in this particular case the votes had been carefully guarded by the mayor and recorder, under a special law for the city of Philadelphia." The committee have decided against the abstract propriety of counting votes over and over again whenever anybody wishes it.

Mr. STILES. The report seems to go upon the ground that these boxes have been tampered with. I will read from the report:

"To adopt a rule that the ballot-boxes should be opened upon the mere request of the defeated candidate would occasion more fraud than it could possibly expose. The number of ballot-boxes in each congressional district is seldom less than fifty, and often more than two hundred. They are usually left in the care of a magistrate or some township officer, by whom they are deposited in no safer place than an upper shelf in a public office. The opportunities of tampering with the boxes thus scattered through the district would be abundant; and if it was known in advance that a second count could be had without disclosing the first, the temptation to do so would be strong."

I submit that that does not apply to this case at all. Under the law of 1861 these boxes were kept where they could not be tampered with. The mayor so testifies.

In deciding to refuse to allow a recount the committee has decided the whole case; and I suppose no argument here could reverse the report in this House. Mr. Kline is satisfied he was duly elected, and that upon a proper investigation of the case this fact would appear. Protesting for him against the conduct of the mayor of Philadelphia in refusing to do his duty, and protesting against the action of the committee, I submit the case for the decision of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to dispense with private business during the remainder of the day.

Mr. STILES. I hope my colleague will yield a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I had hoped this would be the last time I should be asked to yield. This has been a very unlucky day for me. I hope we shall proceed with the Pacific railroad bill now.

The House divided on the motion; and no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. STEVENS and Mr. STILES.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first business is the Pacific railroad bill; the previous question has been called upon the pending amendments thereto.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the contested election case of Carrigan vs. Thayer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot call that case up now, as the House is now engaged in the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. What is the case?

Mr. DAWES. Carrigan vs. Thayer, upon which I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. If it will not occupy any time, and the gentleman will call the previous question and stick to it, I will yield.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. Upon that condition I yield. Mr. STILES. I ask leave, on behalf of Mr. Carrigan, the contestant, that he may be permitted to print the remarks he has prepared, as he is not present.

Leave was granted.

The following are the remarks:

Mr. CARRIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I embrace this opportunity to present to this honorable body over which you preside with impartiality and ability my sincere acknowledgments for the courtesy of the floor, pending the contest about to be decided, and for the privilege accorded me of addressing the House in my own behalf. The honorable Committee of Elections, after a patient hearing, have, by their report, made me responsible for a defect in the law of 1851, prescribing the mode of taking evidence, which defect excludes the great mass of testimony adduced. Construing the law with judicial nicety, the decision of the committee may be right; but viewing the equities, as well as the great latitude invariably allowed in cases of this kind, I think the committee, without straining their delegated authority or assuming any more than the usual responsibility, might have admitted the whole of my testimony. In their judgment they have decided otherwise; to it I respectfully submit, but not without my earnest protest.

At an earlier period in the session I would have spoken at length upon this point, as well as the merits of my case, prepared at the cost of much time and labor; but in view of an early adjournment, which all desire, and the unfinished business of much more importance to the public and this House than any remarks I might make, I waive the right you have accorded me, ask leave to print what I may desire to say, and await with submission the judgment of the House on the resolutions reported from the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I call the previous question upon the resolutions reported by the committee.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the following resolutions were agreed to:

Resolved, That Charles W. Carrigan is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the fifth congressional district in Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That M. Russell Thayer is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the fifth congressional district in Pennsylvania.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. W. J. ALLEN, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. J. C. ALLEN.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentlemen from Pennsylvania to give way a moment to allow the Committee on Military Affairs to report back two Senate bills that they may be printed and recommitment to the committee. One is a bill to reorganize the quartermaster's department, and the other the engineer department.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that. Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave to report the bills for the purposes I have mentioned.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that they are not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, I shall not object.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is an independent question. I am going to ask unanimous consent to be permitted to report them back at some given time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are there two bills or one? The SPEAKER. Two.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SCHENCK thereupon, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the following bills, which, with the amendments, were ordered to be printed and recommitment to the committee, namely:

An act (S. No. 154) to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department; and

An act (S. No. 151) relating to enlistments, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be permitted to report back these bills at such time as suits the convenience of the House and the committee.

Unanimous consent was granted.

BOARD OF HEALTH FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to present a petition for the establishment of a board of health for this District.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no; it is too hot for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRIGGS. I merely wish to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

Mr. DRIGGS thereupon, by unanimous consent, presented the petition alluded to, and the same was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 438, to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the bill.

The SPEAKER. That supersedes the previous question on the amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is the amendment entered which I offered the other evening to strike out the tenth section?

The SPEAKER. That amendment is entered.

Mr. ALLISON asked and obtained unanimous consent to offer the following amendment:

Provided, That no bonds shall be issued or land certified by the United States to any person or company for the construction of any part of the main trunk line of said railroad west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude and east of the Rocky mountains until said road shall be completed from or near Omaha, on the Missouri river, to the said one hundredth meridian of longitude.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken first on the following amendment offered by Mr. PRYNN:

Insert as follows:

The President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a board of commissioners, to consist of seven persons, who shall have and possess all the powers now vested in the Union Pacific Railroad Company, under the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and the said commissioners shall proceed without delay to construct the said railroad and telegraph line as authorized by the said act. The said commissioners shall not be entitled to any compensation for their services, but their necessary expenses, to be audited by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be paid to them respectively.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 72.

The question was next on the following amendment offered by Mr. PRYNN:

Add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the surveys which may be made for the line of the railroad of the said Union Pacific Railroad Company, and any branches or side lines to be constructed by said company, and the maps and profiles thereof, shall be submitted to a commission of three skillful and impartial engineers, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who, or a majority of them, shall, subject to the approval of the President, fix upon and determine the termini and route or line of said road, and of any and every side line or branch thereof above referred to, and the said road, side lines, and branches shall be constructed on the said several routes or lines so determined upon; and if at any time the directors of the said company shall desire to change any part of the route or line of the said road the provisions hereinbefore contained shall apply to such proposed new line, and the route thereof shall be settled and determined upon in like manner as is above provided with regard to the original line or route of said roads. All determinations of the said commissioners shall be reduced to writing, and be subscribed by them, or a majority of them, in duplicate, one to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other to be delivered to the said company.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The question was next on the following amendment offered by Mr. PRYNN:

Add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That before any of the bonds of the United States, authorized by this act to be issued to the said company, to aid in the construction of its road and works, shall be issued or delivered to the said company, the directors thereof shall submit to and file with the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of all contracts, if any, made up to that time by the said company, relating to the survey, location, or construction of its said road and works, and to the purchase of iron rails or rolling stock therefor; which statement shall be verified by the oath of the President and a majority of the directors of the said company, or in such other manner as the Secretary of the Treasury and Attorney General may require, and unless the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General shall be satisfied that the said contracts are fair and bona fide, and that it is for the interest of the said company, and of the United States, that the same should be carried into effect, the said Secretary shall withhold the issue and delivery of said bonds until the said contracts, or such of them as may not be approved, shall be properly annulled or modified, to the satisfaction of the said Secretary and Attorney General. And from and after the passage of this act, no contract which may be entered into by the said company for the purchase of real estate or iron rails, or in any way for or on account of the construction of its road or works, or the purchase of rolling stock therefor, shall be of any force, effect, or validity, until the same shall have been approved by the said

Secretary and Attorney General. But the said Secretary and Attorney General may at any time give such limited authority to the said company to make contracts for the purchase of such real estate as it may need for the line and accommodations of its road, subject to such terms as they may deem proper, and to the final approval of the said Secretary and Attorney General, and the said Secretary and Attorney General may at any time require the services of any officer or officers, or the engineer or topographical corps to be detailed on their requests by the Secretary of War, to aid them in the discharge of the duties hereby conferred to them; and if the said company shall construct or equip its road and branches, or any part thereof, by its own officers or agents, it shall from time to time, and as often as the Secretary of the Treasury and Attorney General may require the same, and at least quarterly, report to the said Secretary and Attorney General, in writing, under the oath of its president and treasurer, and at least three of its directors, as to the extent and character of the work in which it is engaged, and the cost thereof, classified by items, with all such particulars as the said Secretary and Attorney General may require; and if the said Secretary and Attorney General are not satisfied with the proceedings of the said company in the premises, the said Secretary shall not issue or deliver to the said company any further amount of the bonds authorized to be issued in aid of the said company as aforesaid, until the said company shall have done such acts and conformed to such arrangements and requirements as may be satisfactory to the said Secretary and Attorney General.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The question was next on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the tenth section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That section five of said act be so modified and amended that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and any other company authorized to participate in the construction of said road, may issue their first mortgage bonds on their respective railroads and telegraph lines to an amount not exceeding the amount of the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued to said railroad companies respectively. And the lien of the United States bonds shall be subordinate to that of the bonds of any or either of said companies hereby authorized to be issued on their respective roads, property, and equipments. And said section is further amended by striking out the word "forty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on each and every section of not less than twenty."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 81, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Cobb, Crosswell, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Farnsworth, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Law, Marcy, McDowell, Morrison, Nelson, John O'Neill, Orth, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Joseph W. White—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Gooch, Griswold, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Benjamin Wood—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Colfroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dumont, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, King, Lazar, Loan, Mallory, McAllister, Melndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Odell, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Prynn, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Strouse, Thomas, Voorhes, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question was next on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] above reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not yet engrossed. The bill will go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. WILSON demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the motion. Mr. BROOKS. I renew the motion.

NAVY-YARD AT CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered on the Journal. The business next in order is the unfinished business of the Committee on Naval Affairs, being the joint resolution in reference to a navy-yard for iron-clads in the western waters.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not present. I offer as an amendment to the joint resolution the bill on the same subject passed by the Senate.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I suggest to my colleague to ask to have that bill taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I adopt that suggestion.

There being no objection, Senate bill No. 190, to establish a navy-yard and depot at Cairo, in the State of Illinois, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of order, that the bill contains an appropriation, and it must first be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That point of order comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The point of order the Chair thinks comes too late. This bill was by general consent substituted for the House bill.

Mr. WILSON. I rose as soon as the bill was read, and could not know that it contained an appropriation until it was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the matter came up in the first place as unfinished business. The suggestion was made very audibly to the House that the Senate bill should be taken up instead of the House bill. The question was put to the House, and no objection was made. The Chair thinks, although the bill had not been read, as it was taken up by unanimous consent it is now too late to raise an objection.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman will have to wait until he gets the floor before he makes that motion.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted for two days to Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

NAVAL DEPOT.

Mr. FENTON. With the leave of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to know how, in accordance with his practice, that gentleman can possibly vote to expend all this money. I understood him to say the other day in the House that he would not consent to spend any money of the Government that was not absolutely necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is precisely my line of legislation, and this legislation is precisely in that line. If the gentleman from New York is as consistent, I do not think his reputation will suffer.

Mr. FENTON. I do not anticipate any damage to my reputation in comparison to that the gentleman from Illinois will suffer in advocating this bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman presently.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition which the House has now before it is one which has been considered most elaborately by the Senate, and which passed that body with only three dissenting votes. I need not tell the House what every member here must know, that the establishment of a naval depot on the Mississippi river or some of its tributaries is absolutely necessary. It is well known that we have some three or four hundred naval vessels on that river; we are building more, and there must be some place for repairs to be made. Everybody, I believe, agrees to the proposition that we must have a naval depot on the Mississippi river.

Now the only question which arises is, as to the best method of establishing it, and as to the point to be selected. The proposition of the Naval Committee of the House was to authorize the appointment of a naval commission by the Secretary of the Navy, to be composed, as I now recollect, of one civilian, one Navy officer, and one Army officer, whose duty it should be, after making proper investigations, to determine upon a site, their decision to be final.

Now I take it for granted that this House will prefer to hold the power in its own hands, and not to abdicate its authority in favor of any commission. The whole question came up in the Senate in regard to the proper course to be pursued, whether a commission should be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, or whether Congress itself should determine upon the locality, and that is the only question before the House, for I do not believe there can be any doubt that we must have a naval depot somewhere on the Mississippi river; and taking that for granted, I cannot conceive there can be any doubt that Cairo, or some point in its neighborhood, is the only suitable point there can be for its location. There is always water enough for ordinary-sized boats there. There is never ice to interfere with the operations. Cairo and Mound City are both healthy, and I believe there is no reasonable objection to its location at that point.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether, if this bill passes, there is any possibility of the location of this naval depot at Mound City?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill says "at or near Cairo."

Mr. WILSON. I think it says "at Cairo."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. "At or near Cairo" is the language of the bill. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read from the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if he is not satisfied that I am right.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman will permit me to answer his question I will say that I am aware of the fact of there being a heavy lobby influence at work in both Houses to secure the passage of this bill, in order that the location may be fixed at Cairo; and that if the bill must pass it is a foregone conclusion that Cairo is the point at which it will be fixed. I know that those who are best acquainted with the locality of Cairo declare that it is entirely unfit for the establishment of a naval depot, and therefore I desire the appointment of a commission.

I ask the gentleman, before he attempts to put this bill through under the previous question, to allow a fair opportunity for the discussion of the merits of the question involved.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has made a charge in regard to the lobby. I desire to ask him who the lobby are and what measures they have taken to force this bill for Cairo through Congress. Let him give us the names of the lobby members.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to give any names to the gentleman from Illinois. I propose to meet him exactly as he has met other questions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has charged that there is a very heavy lobby to get the naval depot located at Cairo. He says he knows the fact. I ask him to give us the names of some of the parties who are here lobbying.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to do any such thing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then the gentleman had no right to make such a statement.

Mr. WILSON. I am doing exactly what the gentleman has done on other occasions.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I insist that it is not in order for two gentlemen to talk at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa has failed to make good the charge which he has made here before the House. He says that he has only done the same as I have done on other occasions. Sir, I have made no charges upon any bill which I have not been prepared to meet. When I make charges and I am called upon to stand up to them I never take the back track. I do not say my friend does.

Mr. WILSON. I do not do so either.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that I offered the amendment to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts for the reason that my colleague, [Mr. W. J. ALLEN,] in whose district Cairo is, and who, therefore, feels a deeper interest in the matter than I do, was absent. I will yield now to my colleague.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. It was not my purpose to have said a single word upon this question, deep as is the interest I feel in its decision by this House. That the House should be informed as to the character of the entire question, at an early period of the session I took the trouble to have laid upon the desk of every member a memorial in regard to this matter, and evidence as to Cairo being the proper location for a depot and navy-yard. With this I expected to be content and bow submissively to any conclusion the House might reach. Remarks have been made, however, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and others that would seem to require a passing notice from me. I represent the district where this depot is proposed to be located. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say that there had been a very heavy lobby interest at work for the purpose of passing this bill. Now, if that is the fact, I desire to state that it is wholly unknown to me. I think I know almost every prominent citizen in Cairo. I live within fifty miles of the place, and I do not think there have been half a dozen citizens of Cairo in Washington during the present session. If any one had been here lobbying in regard to this matter I rather think they would have approached me upon the subject. If any one has approached the gentleman and attempted to influence his action, or has approached any member of the House for that purpose, I should like to know the names of the persons who have done it.

I understand him to say that Cairo is not the proper place for the location of a depot of this character. That may be his opinion, but I hope such opinion will not be binding upon this House. All I have to say to the gentleman is that in expressing that opinion he comes in direct conflict with Commodore Foote, and very many other gentlemen who are perfectly familiar with the location of Cairo, and all the facilities at that point necessary to carry on successfully a navy-yard depot. I have the written opinion of Commodore Foote and of other naval officers based upon their actual knowledge, as well as upon surveys made, which refute any such judgment as that pronounced by the gentleman from Iowa. I heard it remarked in the Senate the other day that overflows of the Ohio river could not be prevented in, at, or near Cairo, and some gentlemen here are echoing the statement. Now, I desire to say that that is quite a mistake. Since the present levee, including fifteen hundred acres of land, was constructed it has never been overflowed. At one time there was a break in the levee where it was not protected, but this was soon repaired, and Cairo is as safe from overflow to-day as if the banks of the two rivers were forty feet higher. The floods of 1844 and 1849 ought to have tested satisfactorily the question as to the sufficiency of that levee. At each of those floods the levee remained unimpaired; and the rapidity with which capital is seeking an investment at that point, the vast improvements which every day develop there in buildings and business of every description, show that the public have some confidence in Cairo, even if the honorable gentleman from Iowa has none.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend from New York says that he understands it overflows during the year—that for a large portion of the year it is under water.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. What friend is that? I should like to have his explicit statement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume the gentleman from New York wants the truth in regard to this matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I said that I had known of the Mississippi overflowing the lands at Cairo. I have not known that fact within the last two years, but I have known it in years gone by. I have known it within the last eight years, not from personal observation, but from those who bought land there, that they had to take a boat and a long pole to find those lands. [Laughter.]

I will say that I have had some little personal experience with the Mississippi river. I once bought a farm of one hundred and forty-five acres, lying upon the banks of the Mississippi river. It was a beautiful farm, nice location; but the next time I went to see it it was fourteen feet under water. And I went back to Chicago to find the man who screws up whole blocks in that city to know whether I could not make a contract to have my farm screwed up. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to say that I have resided on these rivers and have known the Ohio river to fall forty-five feet. All the lands adjacent to the table lands were inundated, but I take it that did not destroy the value of most of the fine town sites.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York, if he will allow me, that there is no question but what the land at Cairo flooded before the levee was constructed. There is no sort of doubt about that, else there would have been no use of a levee; but I hardly think my friend will have the temerity to say that it has been overflowed since the levee was built. If he were to hazard that statement it would be reckless, to say the least of it. That the Mississippi overflows at many places, and that the gentleman's fine farm was inundated, I am ready to believe; but that has nothing to do with the question we are considering. There are other gentlemen upon this floor who are so much more familiar with the facts of the case—I do not include myself—than the gentleman from New York, that I hope for his own sake he will not repeat the statements he so unadvisedly indulged in a few moments since. I repeat, whatever the gentleman has to say in respect to the Mississippi river I have nothing to reply. I suppose, as I before remarked, that it does overflow in many places. But the point where it is proposed to locate this naval station is about two and a half miles up the Ohio river, where it seldom overflows without there being any protection afforded by a levee. There may have been instances of overflow, but I think they have rarely occurred. When it is remembered that the proposed site of the navy-yard is about thirty-five feet above ordinary low water, and about seven below extreme high water, as determined by a competent and careful engineer, the fears afflicting gentlemen so seriously from overflow will, I hope, be allayed. Gentlemen talk about the cost, &c., at this time of national trouble.

I will remark upon this point that the Cairo City Company offers the Government forty acres of land, if that quantity should be necessary, at a place having abundance of water, with ample anchorage to float the largest vessels, only two miles and a half from the city of Cairo on the Ohio river, not the Mississippi. That company also owns the river front for four miles up the Mississippi and four miles up the Ohio, and it gives the Government the right to select any place deemed most advantageous upon either river, and as much land wherever the selection is made as may be necessary for this naval yard and depot.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. What has been the average rise of the Mississippi at Cairo? What has been the highest flood there?

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I cannot answer the first question with certainty; indeed, a feeling of trepidation comes over me by the sad attempt made by the gentleman himself a short time ago. In regard to the second, I have just stated that the site indicated on this chart [holding it up] for the navy-yard, two and a half miles above the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, is seven feet below extreme high-water mark.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Is it between five and six feet?

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I cannot pretend to say that, or be more precise than I have, unless I follow the example set me by the gentleman, and I have a repugnance to doing that.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I wish to corroborate the statement of my friend from Ohio in regard to the Ohio river. I have seen the same thing.

Mr. FENTON. I understand there is a letter from Admiral Porter in the possession of my friend from Maine, which I hope will be read.

Mr. PIKE. When the gentleman from Illinois closes his remarks I wish to say a word.

Mr. FENTON. Have this letter read.

Mr. PIKE. Has the gentleman from Illinois concluded his remarks?

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I understand the gentleman desires to read a letter, and as I have heard a great deal about Admiral Porter's disinterested action with reference to this matter I yield for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his remarks I will read it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois holds the floor by my consent, and if he is through I will yield it to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. WILSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I understand the gentleman to say that the particular point at which it is intended to locate this yard is never inundated. I ask the gentleman to state where that particular point is?

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I have said very rarely did it overflow. I favored no particular point myself for the location of this yard. But the point where I suppose it is intended to locate it is about two and a half miles above Cairo, outside of the levee, on the Ohio river. I had simply supposed that was the point from marks and indications upon the maps and charts. Soundings have been taken there, and the depth of the water ascertained and marked. The depth of the water is shown to be amply sufficient, and the current is only one and a half mile an hour. It is adjacent to the railroad; coal, iron, and timber of every character necessary in abundance. These, with various other reasons, induced me to suppose that that particular point would probably be selected.

Mr. WILSON. My object was to show that Mound City was entirely out of this ring, and that Cairo was already determined as the point.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I desire to say to the gentleman that I represent Mound City as well as Cairo, and I did not know till he was kind enough to inform me that it was entirely out of the ring.

Mr. WILSON. I supposed so, for the reason that the gentleman named a point only one and a half mile from Cairo.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I take much interest in Mound City, and in every other locality in my district. This bill only authorizes the President to locate this yard, if he wishes, at or near Cairo, and I suppose Mound City is entirely within the terms of the bill, and if the President deems that the best place he will have the navy-yard located there.

Mr. WILSON. But it seems to be understood that it is to be located only a mile and a half from Cairo.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. These maps and charts were prepared with reference to the location of the navy-yard at Cairo. This I do not controvert, and the reason for it was the supposition that Cairo was the proper point; yet I have no objection or desire that Mound City should not have a fair and honorable competition with Cairo, and the naval depot located there by the President if it is thought to be the better place. I do not believe the people of Cairo think it is, nor do I believe that the people of Mound City think Cairo the better place. The people in neither place, so far as I know, have objected to the course I have pursued in reference to this matter. I think Mound City is near enough to Cairo to come within the terms of the bill, if it is thought to be the better place. I do not propose to put it out of the ring, or put it in, but to leave its merits and the merits of Cairo to be passed upon by the President. I hardly think my constituents at Mound City, even though dissatisfied with me as their Representative, would exhibit such folly as they would manifest by calling on the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], to represent them. They have shown in the past a degree of intelligence and energy precluding any such an idea. No, sir. That gentleman is a volunteer in this matter.

But, Mr. Chairman, let all this go. That gentlemen from Iowa, from Missouri, from Indiana, and other portions of the country would like to have this great national improvement within their respective States is not to be wondered at. I beg of them, however, not to blame Cairo, because that point is the head of navigation on the Mississippi for vessels of the largest class. Above it and between it and St. Louis you have low water and sand-bars and innumerable difficulties in summer and autumn, rendering navigation difficult even for small steamers, and in winter you often have ice for periods embracing many weeks, suspending navigation altogether.

The objections to locating a depot for naval purposes high up on the Ohio at Evansville, at New Albany, or any intermediate point, are still more insuperable if possible. Gentlemen, do not let your State pride drive you into opposition to a measure which the President and Secretary of the Navy have both told you is of vital national importance at this time.

I want the location near Cairo, it is true. I have taken a deep interest in trying to get this Congress to fix upon that as the place, but whether gentlemen believe me or not, I will say that if I thought there was a better place for the location of this depot, intended to strengthen the main arm of the public service, even though that place was outside of my State, I would go for it cordially, and contribute everything in my power looking to its success. Holding the floor as I do, by the courtesy of my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] I reluctantly yield it to him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPALDING. It will be recollected by the House that some weeks ago the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House asked permission to go and explore the western country and select a suitable site for this navy-yard. The House refused to grant that permission. In that decision of the House the Naval Committee acquiesced, and then, from the best lights before them, made a report to this House recommending the appointment of a commission to go, examine, and select a suitable site for a navy-yard. So much for the action of the committee.

Now, a bill comes into this House from the Senate, locating the navy-yard at or near Cairo, in Illinois. It is asked that this bill may be committed to the standing Committee on Naval Affairs of this House. Is it to be refused? Is it to be expected that this bill, so very important in its character and consequences, will be passed through this House with every member of the Naval Committee voting against it, for such will be the case unless the bill is committed? I do not speak here in my place against Cairo or Mound City, much less do I wish to be considered as committed individually against either point. I am as well prepared to vote, or shall vote, in favor of Cairo as Mound City, or perhaps any other place to be suggested. But there are some other points, some on the Mississippi, some on the Ohio, that deserve consideration.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have had petitions in abundance referred to them from points in Indiana, as well as from Illinois, and from points in Missouri as well as from Indiana and Illinois, and it is no more than proper that those petitions and memorials shall be considered.

Now, is this House prepared to say that Cairo, and no other point but Cairo, is the place for the establishment of the depot? As a member of the Naval Committee, I most respectfully protest against it; and I ask that the House will commit this bill to the Naval Committee for its consideration and report, or else amend the bill by the substitute reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs appointing a commission to select a suitable site. If the bill be pressed to a vote now, without submitting it to the consideration of the Naval Committee, or without the amendment of that committee, I shall feel constrained to vote against it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield now to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. PIKE. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken in regard to this resolution know what this site is from personal observation. In that respect they are better informed than I am. I can only speak from what I hear; but I supposed that Cairo was always liable to overflow at the periods of high water in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. One gentleman who represents a western district told me yesterday that he was there two years ago, and found it so overflowed that they could only get into the second story of the houses there by paddling a boat and getting in through the windows.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What member was that?

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Law, of Indiana. The proposition of the Naval Committee is to refer the matter to a commission, to report a suitable site; and the question before the House is between that proposition and the Senate bill, which fixes the site at Cairo. A letter from Admiral Foote has been quoted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. W. J. ALLEN] as being in favor of fixing the site at Cairo. I hold in my hand the letter he refers to, dated February 9, 1863, and I ask the attention of the House to his description of Cairo. He says:

"In relation to Cairo, the soil is alluvial, and in the highest stages of water it is difficult at times to prevent the overflowing of the levee, involving serious damage of material and stores."

That is Admiral Foote's opinion. I hold in my hand another letter, one from Admiral Porter, and I call attention to it because something has been said of a lobby, about which I know nothing. I understand in relation to Cairo, and have always understood, that it was an eastern speculation, and a very bad speculation at that. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of Admiral Porter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

MISSISSIPPI SQUADRON, FLAG SHIP BLACK HAWK, CAIRO, February 21, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers that a resolution has been offered in the House of Representatives to vote $500,000 for a navy-yard at Cairo. This is only a move of speculators, and I hope that no place will be specified in the West without the matter being examined by a competent board of naval officers. Cairo is not the place, anyhow. I do not know that we want any navy-yard appropriation just yet. I have fitted out the largest squadron in the Navy with a few old Frémont mortar-boats converted into blacksmith shops and a few floating carpenter shops, and can now get along very well.

I thought it right to inform you of this matter, as there is no use to waste any more money than can be helped.

Very truly, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER,

Rear Admiral.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senate, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. PIKE. Now, the question is whether the House knows so much about this situation at Cairo as to fix definitely a navy-yard there against the opinion of these distinguished naval officers, rather than submit the matter to a board, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, who shall go out there and examine, and after examination pronounce an opinion as to the best site for this purpose. I have no personal interest in this matter, nor have my constituents. But we wish two things: we wish to get the best place for a navy-yard, and we wish to save the public money. If it be a fact, as suggested by Admiral Porter, that there are speculators at the bottom of this matter, that is an additional reason why this bill should not now be passed by the House. But throwing that out of consideration, the House has no information on which it can say to-day that Cairo is the best place for a western navy-yard, and a commission can decide where the best place is.

Under these circumstances I hope the amendment will not prevail. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] has a letter in relation to this subject which I wish he would have read.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to have the letter read?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask then that the letter which I send up, from the chief engineer of the Navy Department, be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, February 17, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I have just returned here from taking one of the gunboats to Admiral Porter's fleet, and received your letter of the 8th instant.

I regret not being prepared to give you an opinion regarding the proper location for a navy-yard at the West. It is a subject requiring careful investigation and consideration. It seems to me that the only safe and sure action for Congress is to cause a commission or board of competent persons to be appointed to thoroughly examine and report upon the points by them deemed best suited to the purpose. This should be a mixed board of some five members. Say two naval officers, two from the Coast Survey, and one engineer.

There will doubtless be influence brought from many points, and all kinds of representations of the claimants regarding the superiority of their different localities.

So far as my observation and experience have extended I consider Cairo or Mound City totally unfit for such an establishment, and any place on the Mississippi above Cairo should not be considered at all, because there is not sufficient depth of water from here to Cairo for more than ninety days in the year to float a vessel of eight feet draught of water. As an illustration of what might be expected if a navy-yard were located here, I will state that the gunboat Ozark, drawing only six feet of water, has been here since August last, until a few days ago, awaiting the water to rise so that she could be taken to Cairo, and that several vessels have been on the stocks here, ready for launching, several months, awaiting the rise in the river, and their launching draught is only five feet.

The location for a navy-yard should be where vessels of any required draught used for naval purposes could reach it every day in the year.

Yours, truly,
J. W. KING,
Chief Engineer United States Navy.

HON. J. K. MOOREHEAD, M. C.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will now give way to the gentleman from Maine to offer the resolution of the Committee on Naval Affairs as an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. PIKE. I offer that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am a little surprised, I must confess, at the hostility which gentlemen on the Naval Committee manifest to this great western interest. I am surprised that my friend from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] from a part of the country which has been for many years the recipient of aid from the Government in the way of fishing bounties, and which has been also receiving millions and millions for coast fortifications, should come in here and make an argument, the effect of which is, as he must know, to prevent the people of the Mississippi valley from being adequately defended.

Mr. PIKE. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois I wish to clinch this matter of fishing bounties. The fishermen of Maine do not receive really one cent at the hands of the Government, for they pay back to-day day by day as duty on the salt which they consume every dollar that is paid them as fishing bounty.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my friend will not get into a passion about the cod fisheries.

Mr. PIKE. Not at all.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There are other people besides the recipients of fishing bounties who pay duty on salt and do not get it back. If I read aright the report of the Secretary of the Treasury there is about $350,000 paid annually by the Government to these fishermen.

Mr. PIKE. They pay it back.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. They pay it back the same as I do when I put a little salt in my porridge. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. You will admit that under the reciprocity treaty codfish is brought in from Nova Scotia free of duty, salt and all.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I admit nothing, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] I know there is no disposition on the part of the House to do a great act of injustice to the people of the valley of the Mississippi. I do not see why it is that in the present position of our affairs the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] object to legislation which is absolutely necessary for our protection. Is it because they do not want to have the Mississippi river open? Do they not wish the Government to have some point on the western waters where it can have our gunboats repaired which are to keep open the great channel of communication with the ocean, so that the farmers of the Northwest can have an easy and cheap access to market instead of having their products subjected to the tolls of railroads in getting to the Atlantic coast?

No gentleman has controverted the fact that there is a necessity for a naval depot in the West. But the object seems to be to delay action here until it shall be too late to accomplish anything. A letter has been read here, addressed to a Senator from Iowa, who resisted the passage of this bill in the Senate to the utmost extent of his ability, but ineffectually. That is the letter in which Admiral Porter speaks of this as being a project of speculators. Who are the speculators that Admiral Porter refers to? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] spoke of a lobby from Cairo.

Mr. WILSON. I beg leave to correct the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, a lobby in the interest of Cairo. I tell that gentleman and the House that no man outside of this House has ever mentioned to me the subject of a navy-yard at Cairo. No man has approached me in reference to it; and I am sure that no one has approached the gentleman from Iowa, because if they knew him as well as I do they would know his incorruptibility and the vigilance with which he guards the public Treasury, and they would not come near him.

Mr. WILSON. They would find out before they got through how foolish it was to lose their time in that way.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is what I thought, and therefore I thought it strange they would so lose their time. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] has alluded to the communication of Admiral Foote, and has tried to put a construction on the bill, I think unfairly, that the navy-yard is to be located at Cairo. There is no such provision in the bill. It is left open. It may be located either at Cairo or at Mound City; and if there are the objections to Cairo which the gentleman suggests, there are no such objections at Mound City. It has all the advantages of Cairo, with the additional one of being on high rolling ground.

Mr. WILSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois I desire to ask him whether he will consent to have the Senate bill so amended as to read, "at or near Cairo or Mound City?"

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. WILSON. That will help the matter some.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask that the joint resolution of the House may be read for information.

The joint resolution was read by the Clerk.

Mr. PIKE. I have not the slightest objection to the gentleman from Illinois boasting of the Northwest as often as he pleases; I like to hear him boast of the great Northwest, whether it is once a week or twice a week. I have no objection to his flying the flag of the West as his colleague did last session, but in doing that he need not take the trouble to talk about Maine. We ask no odds of the great Northwest; we can take care of ourselves as well as the Northwest can.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Maine know what he is talking about?

Mr. PIKE. I know very well—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I say does the gentleman from Maine know what he is talking about when he proposes to pit little Maine against Illinois? [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. I do not pit Maine against anybody. I know very well what I am talking about, and I know what the gentleman is talking about when he speaks of "our Northwest" and of "opposing the great northwestern interests." I have heard him say that several times before, and sometimes he means by "Northwest" a ship canal, and sometimes a sunken strip of land at Cairo. What is the question here? It is the question of a little town sometimes under water and sometimes out of water, owned, as I understand, by speculators in eastern States; and that is "the great northwestern interest" the gentleman from Illinois talks about; and for the sake of that little town the gentleman from Illinois proposes to declare war against the little State of Maine—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, no. I cannot yield the floor any further. The gentleman from Maine is getting so excited for this warm weather that I really must be excused.

Mr. BLOW. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question before some other positions have been brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my friend from Missouri will keep cool and he will have an opportunity to be heard in due time.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope everybody will keep as cool as the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am as cool as a calm summer's morning. I say to the gentleman from Missouri that I do not propose to call the previous question. I know that my friend is interested in another locality, and it is proper that he should be heard. He does not differ with me as to the importance of this great Navy improvement.

Mr. CRAVENS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment? I desire to say a word in behalf of another locality.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman will have an opportunity after I get through.

Mr. CRAVENS. Is it the intention of the gentleman to call the previous question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, no, I have just informed two gentlemen that I did not intend to call the previous question at all. I am for a free fight on this question, and if the House prefer to take the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Maine, I shall be compelled to be satisfied, as I am always satisfied, as the House knows, with its action. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I did not know the gentleman was entirely satisfied about the canal last year.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I was about as well satisfied with the action of the House about the canal as the gentleman from Pennsylvania was last night with its action upon the loan bill, I imagine. I think we may as well pair off about that matter. I do not see any ground for a quarrel. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I do not quarrel with anybody.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine in reading from the report of Admiral Foote did not read the entire document, and it sometimes happens that to read a particular portion of a document torn from its context will produce an entirely different impression from the document read as a whole.

I will ask that the letter of Admiral Foote may be read, so that his opinion may be shown in regard to all of the localities that have been mentioned. The House will see then what he thinks of Mound City and the other localities where this naval depot may be located under this bill.

The Clerk read, as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
WASHINGTON, February 5, 1863.

SIR: Your letter of the 4th instant, to the Secretary of the Navy, in reference to the advantages of a navy-yard on the Mississippi river, has been referred to me by the Navy Department.

The importance of a navy-yard at some point on the Mississippi river cannot be over-estimated, especially in time of war.

Regarding the best location for a navy-yard, I must frankly confess that I am not at present prepared to give an opinion wholly satisfactory to myself, not having visited Memphis, nor given that attention to Carondelet, Cairo, and Mound City, which is requisite in one who is thus suddenly called upon for his views.

I presume that my opinions are wanted more in reference to the physical condition of the site for a yard than the political state of its locality, or even, perhaps, of its accessibility and facility in procuring the material for construction and equipment of vessels. While at the West, in improving the gunboat flotilla, there were only three points which struck me as adapted for navy-yard purposes. These were, Carondelet, near St. Louis; Cairo, at the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers; and Mound City, on the Ohio river, nine miles above the city of Cairo.

Carondelet, the first named, has a good water front of sufficient depth, I believe, at all seasons of the year, for floating gunboats of any draught. The fact of this point having been selected in building four of the first iron-clad boats that were launched on the western rivers, and all the heavy iron-clads at present under contract on the Mississippi river, seems to show that this place contains many important advantages. Here there is no overflow in the highest stage of the river, to say nothing of the advantage of its being in the vicinity of so large a city as St. Louis, together with the great number of iron-clad gunboats constructed, and now being built, at this place. On the other hand, the disadvantages of Carondelet arise from insufficiency of water in the autumn and early part of winter, preventing, at times, the large boats from reaching Cairo. This obstacle may exist for three months in the year, as will be seen by the correct tide or water table. Of the tendency of the channel to diverge from its present course I have no data sufficient to form an opinion. In the month of October, 1861, our four iron-clad gunboats built by contract, as well as the purchased gunboats, Benton and Essex, could not be floated over two or three of the shoals until most of the coal, guns, and heavy stores were taken out to lessen their draught to five feet. I believe that during nine months of the year, as a general rule, gunboats of a draught not exceeding seven feet might safely reach Cairo without difficulty from shoal water.

The city of Cairo contains many advantages for a navy-yard. It lies at the terminus of the Illinois Central railroad. It can be easily defended against an attack, and has, on the Ohio river part of the town, an extensive water front sufficient to float gunboats of the heaviest draught. But, on the other hand, the soil is alluvial, and in the highest stage of water it is difficult at times to prevent the overflow of the levee, involving serious damages of material and stores. This was the case in May last; the powder and shell could only be safely stored aboard of steamers lining the levee, while it affords no safe place for a magazine or even store-houses containing perishable articles.

Mound City, a distance of nine miles up the Ohio river from Cairo, has rather more elevation than Cairo. Already three iron-clad gunboats have been built there, and this place has "ways" for hauling up and repairing steamers. Like Carondelet, it also has facilities, though in a lesser degree, for building and repairing steamers. Still the soil here is alluvial also, and it is not well adapted for the preservation of stores. A branch of the Illinois railroad extends to Mound City, but the place is not so well adapted to defense as Cairo.

I make no reference to the city of Memphis, other than to say I had no opportunity of visiting it, and therefore am unable to appreciate its comparative advantages for a navy-yard.

If Carondelet should be selected for a navy-yard, a subsidiary or auxiliary yard at Cairo or Mound City is believed to be essential while the water between St. Louis and Cairo is at its lowest stage.

This paper has been drawn up entirely from impressions one would naturally receive on visiting the different places, but without any notes or data to refresh the memory.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. FOOTE,

Rear Admiral United States Navy.

Hon. J. W. NOELL, Naval Committee House of Representatives.

Mr. BLOW. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri for a few moments.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, I think that in this discussion gentlemen of the House have had their minds drawn off from a proposition which would be equally fair to every portion of the country now claiming this navy-yard. I know the adroitness and eloquence of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] who started out by making an explanation which will fall to the ground. He referred to the action of the Senate. Now, every gentleman upon this floor knows that for the last eighteen months before the Naval Committee have appeared the best men in the country, with surveys and reports of more than six different places; that the city of St. Louis and the city of Carondelet have had deputations here, expended large sums of money on plats and surveys, and pressed their claims before the Naval Committee; yet I very much doubt whether in the Senate a single one of these propositions has been considered. I know that St. Louis and Carondelet have not.

I had the honor, sir, early in this session to introduce a bill which at the last Congress received the sanction of the Naval Committee. I was particular to introduce it early in the session. It was a fair proposition. It provided that every point on the western waters making claim to the consideration of this body should be examined by a commission to be appointed for that purpose, and that it should report whether the statements made to this body were right or not, and should select the most judicious point for the public interests.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. W. J. ALLEN] had to admit, when questioned by the gentleman from Iowa, that the navy-yard under this bill is to be above the levee at the city of Cairo; and that admission amounts to this, that it is to be where there is an overflow every time there is a flood on the Ohio river. If the Senate bill is adopted, hundreds of thousands of dollars will have to be expended to protect it against the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi.

If there was a particle of fairness in the proposition I would expect the House to consider it; but there is something so unfair and so ungenerous in the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] that it should fall of itself. I think that the Senate have done great injustice to the Representatives of the people in passing thus hurriedly upon this point when propositions for other points have never come before them. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he is prepared to say that the claims of the cities of Carondelet and St. Louis were considered by that committee?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I infer they have, or they would not make this report.

Mr. BLOW. I assert positively that they have not. The voluminous documents on the subject have never reached them, or never been asked for by them so far as I know.

We have some claims at St. Louis and Carondelet, yet I would scorn to refuse any other place a just consideration by the House. This is a national work, and it should be placed where the Government is to be most benefited. If St. Louis is not the best place and Cairo is, put it at Cairo. We have built at and near St. Louis more iron-clad vessels than at any other point in the Union. We have more mechanics and machinery, I was going to say, than the whole of the gentleman's [Mr. WASHBURNE's] State. I insist that St. Louis is worthy of more consideration than the Senate of the United States was willing to give it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman cannot get up any controversy between me and Missouri; the relations between the people of Missouri and my State are too intimate for that.

Mr. BLOW. I very well recollect that when we made an effort some ninety days ago to have this point examined by the Naval Committee, or a committee of the Naval Department, the gentleman himself threw every obstacle he could in the way.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Entirely true; but the opposition was not directed against St. Louis any more than against Cairo.

Mr. BLOW. I have nothing more to say in reference to this matter; and I appeal to both sides of the House to pass the resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is just and reasonable. It secures action, and does justice to those points which are pleading for consideration at your hands.

Mr. CRAVENS. I concur fully in the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat. This is a matter of great national importance, and I think the public interest will be best subserved by adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and I am disposed to favor it. In order to show that there are other localities entitled to consideration I propose to have read, as a part of my remarks, a memorial from a committee of the city of New Albany, who are making application for the location there of the national navy-yard, if one is to be located in that part of the country. It is addressed to the Naval Committee, and it is proper that it should be read on this occasion to show that there are other localities entitled to consideration. While I have no remarks to make against Cairo, I desire that every point shall be examined.

The Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

To the honorable gentlemen of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: The people of the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, understanding that it is in contemplation by the Congress of the United States to establish a navy-yard for the construction of vessels-of-war at some suitable point in the western States, do by the undersigned most respectfully represent to your honorable body that said city is situated on the northwestern bank of the Ohio river immediately below the foot of the falls of said river; that it is one of the healthiest localities in the western States; that it is celebrated for the building of the finest steamboats that float on the western waters, and has up to the commencement of the rebellion built a majority of all boats navigating the southern rivers and many for St. Louis; that a large proportion of its population are mechanics of the first grade in their line of business; and that although we build a large number of steamers there are still workmen sufficient in number and skill to do a large amount in addition if it was required; that a few miles distant near a railroad leading into the city are large bodies of excellent timber that can be transported on cars to the city; that near the river a few miles below the city are large bodies of good timber that can be transported in barges by water to the city; that there has been for a long series of years annually delivered in the various building yards of the city a large amount of excellent timber hauled from the surrounding country in wagons, and which supply can be continued for many years to come; and that by the river above large quantities can be brought to the city in rafts; that from these various sources of supply above named the best quality of lumber can be procured here at as low a rate as any suitable building point in the western States. Iron can be procured in any quantities that may be desired at the usual prices in the country bordering on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. All other building materials can be had in any quantities desired at fair rates, and provisions of all kinds are abundant. We have foundries, machine shops, spike machines, tilt-hammer forges, saw mills, planing mills, blacksmiths' shops, and other necessary mills, machinery appliances, and the workmen to do the work required for the purpose. Coal for the purpose can be had by railroad from the interior or brought by water from mines both up and down the river. We have railroad communication with all the important points in the Union, and facilities by water with all western and southern rivers and the Gulf of Mexico, obstructed only by rebel enemies. We would further state that we have plenty of suitable ground for a building yard with space for the buildings necessary therefor, that can be bought at a fair price, situated on the river bank opposite a depth of water in the river sufficient for the use of floating docks; and that although during extreme low water there is a trifling more depth of water in the Mississippi river between the mouths of the Ohio and Missouri than there is in the Ohio, yet as the difference between high and low water in the Ohio is much greater than that of the Mississippi, whenever there is a sufficient depth in the Mississippi for a vessel of great draught of water to descend from St. Louis down, there is also a sufficient depth for the same vessel to descend the Ohio to the Mississippi. Also in consequence of the Mississippi river being frozen longer during extreme cold weather than the Ohio is from its mouth to the falls, the Ohio is generally navigable longer during the year for vessels of large draught than the Mississippi is above the mouth of the Ohio, and that almost invariably when the river is frozen the Ohio is navigable a week or two earlier in the spring than the Mississippi is, and that whenever the Ohio is navigable any dis-ance of importance from its mouth it is navigable as far up as New Albany. For verification of the above facts we would respectfully ask your honorable body to make such examination and obtain such evidence as may to you seem proper and satisfactory.

All of which is respectfully submitted for your consideration.

D. M. HOOPER,
J. M. WILSON,
E. NEWLAND,

Committee for the city of New Albany.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to make a suggestion. I intended to offer an amendment to the original resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. In the objections I made to that resolution, I stated that I was not prepared to abrogate the authority of Congress over this matter, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania on my left has drawn up an amendment similar to the one I intended to prepare, and which reaches the same object. It provides that the proceedings of the board of examination shall be reported to Congress at the next session. If that amendment is adopted, I am willing the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] shall be adopted, and I think that will be satisfactory to all parties. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRAVENS] will agree with me in that. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The amendment, which was read, was to strike out "and that he be further empowered, with the approval of the President, to accept or purchase the site so selected, upon such terms as he shall deem most conducive to the public interest," and insert in lieu thereof "and report to the next session of Congress."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Instead of the action of the commission being absolute, it compels them to report to Congress. If that amendment is adopted, it will satisfy all parties.

Mr. PIKE. That amendment I accept.

Mr. CRAVENS. I think the statements made in that memorial to the Committee on Commerce are substantially true, and perhaps the advantages of that locality might be elaborated. In addition to that, there are other localities on the Ohio which are entitled to consideration. For instance the citizens of Evansville believe that that locality would be favorable for the location of a navy-yard. There is also a location lower down and nearer Cairo and Mound City, which abounds in coal, iron ore, and everything which makes it desirable for the location of a navy-yard. The people of that locality have the opinion that they are entitled also to consideration. For these reasons I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. MALLORY. I do not wish it understood by my silence that I have forgotten the claims of Louisville and of Portland—not Maine Portland, but Portland, Kentucky—to this navy-yard. They have merits, and will speak for themselves when they have an opportunity.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. It is very seldom that I rise for the purpose of attempting to enlighten the House, and I do not know that I am entirely competent to do it upon this occasion; but Illinois and Indiana and Maine and Iowa are not the only States interested in this question. I think it must be obvious that the grand mistake which has been committed by this House during this session in regard to this subject has been the refusal to allow the Naval Committee to go to the West for the purpose of selecting the most appropriate location for this depot. If the services of that important committee had not been regarded as desirable here, we could have had all the information necessary to act at this time upon this important question, and it is very evident that this House is not now prepared to pass upon so important a proposition as the claims of these respective localities. Half a dozen places have been already mentioned, and a dozen more which might be mentioned have not been investigated, either by a committee of the House or by members individually. What do we know about the city of New Albany or these other interesting places mentioned by my friend on the left, [Mr. CRAVENS,] and in reference to which he shed a little light on the subject a moment ago? Who ever heard of Portland, in Kentucky, as a place for this depot?

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. SPALDING. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, I move to dispense with the recess for this day, so that we may have no evening session.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN NAVY-YARD—AGAIN.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I desire to inform the House that in addition to the places which have been mentioned on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, there is another small river out there in the West and which borders upon my district about two hundred and forty miles, along which I think it entirely probable that a scientific commission might find a proper location for this naval depot; it is known, sir, as the Missouri river! Its claims have been entirely slighted on this occasion. I want it understood that if this proposed commission is ever instituted the claims of that river and of different localities upon it will be put in and urged according to their respective advantages for the location of this depot.

Mr. MALLORY. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, I will say that it seems to me that there would be no difficulty in finding a low-lying anywhere along the Missouri river, but it is very desirable to find a high-lying for this purpose out there. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. That is a cruel blow at my friend from Cairo, [Mr. W. J. ALLEN.] I do not take it to myself, because the locality which I should prefer, and the locality which I think will be finally selected, is the place referred to (Carondelet) by my honorable colleague, [Mr. BLOW.]

Mr. Speaker, we have had a similar question to this up during this session, in reference to the location of a naval station for the building of iron-clads on the eastern waters. The Naval Committee have been all over the eastern country hunting a site or location for that depot. We have been to Marcus Hook, Chester, and League Island, Long Island, and to New London, and to Boston, and all along the shore; and yet, with all the light of scientific exploration, with all the light shed upon the subject by commissions appointed in years gone by, only a few days ago the House postponed until next session the consideration of the question of the location of a naval station upon the eastern waters! And yet my friend from the Galena district of Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] comes forward now and most vehemently urges the passage of a bill for the location of this depot at Cairo, without any light being shed upon the subject at all, excepting the scanty information which is furnished here in a running debate of an hour or two in this House.

Sir, I protest against the passage of this bill; and I presume the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has gained pretty much all he desired in reference to this bill. It was to give him a solid political foothold in that part of the great State of Illinois known as "Egypt," and in which Cairo is a favorite city. I understand—and I am gratified to know it—that he is now the most popular man in northern Illinois, and that the "lick" will be the means of making him the most popular man in southern Illinois, with the exception of my excellent friend before me, [Mr. W. J. ALLEN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my friend from Missouri does not pass over my colleague near him.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I have excepted him, for I think he is even entitled to be a more popular man both in northern and southern Illinois than yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We will try titles in the north. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Now, if the House has any confidence in my judgment—and I have not yet found that it has not [laughter]—I can indicate the precise point where this naval depot should be located. It is at Carondelet, that beautiful little city, rising on the western bank of the Mississippi river, just south of St. Louis, and distinguished again as being the residence of my friend and colleague, [Mr. BLOW,] who has just presented its claims so fairly and impartially.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman inform us of the depth of water at Carondelet?

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Not quite so deep as at Cairo, especially on shore, [laughter,] but a good deal purer. According to a letter just read from Admiral Foote, that accomplished and observant gentleman, who passed a good many months at Carondelet in superintending the building of iron gunboats, early in the rebellion, there is sufficient depth of water there to float ordinary iron vessels and carry them out into the Mississippi river. And this is all that is needed. It is well known, and has been stated by my friend from Carondelet, that the locality is near St. Louis, where there are manufactories and a large supply of skilled labor. That subject was thoroughly discussed when we had up the League Island and New London questions. In the vicinity of Carondelet are to be found coal mines, mountains of iron, timber, good health, railroad connections, everything that has been described in the memorial sent to the Clerk's desk by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LAW.] It has every possible advantage, not even excepting depth of water, according to the statement of Admiral Foote. Unlike Cairo, it is above high-water mark, has a permanent and solid rock foundation, and presents, in my view, far more advantages for this naval depot than any other point on the Mississippi or its tributaries. Let it be carefully examined by skillful men, and I believe the opinion which I express will be fully sustained.

But, sir, we do not ask it at the present time. It is simply because we do not desire, it unless it be the best locality. In its selection the interests of the whole country should be consulted. This is to be a great national institution, and it ought to be selected at the best possible point, no matter where, whether on the banks of the Missouri, the Mississippi, the Illinois, or the Ohio. It is a national question; and he who would desire to have the navy-yard located at this or that particular point simply because it happened to be in his district or in an adjoining district, takes a very narrow view of the question.

I am opposed, therefore, to any action on the Senate bill at this time; and I favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] to let the matter go over, to be determined by a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I stated that if the gentleman from Maine would accept the amendment that I offered I would agree to his amendment. I think the gentleman from Missouri and I are together on the subject.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I am very glad to hear that we are together. If the gentleman from Illinois would just come with me, we would be together all the time, and I am very sure it would be far better for him and for the country. [Laughter.] I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, that the commission should report to this House at its next session.

But, Mr. Speaker, as there has been a good deal said on this subject here I desire to have such information as can be given to us by my venerable friend who sits just before me, [Mr. LAW.] He is an old western pioneer. I remember when I was a school-boy, thirty years ago, that he was presiding with equal dignity and ability on the bench of the circuit court of the State of Indiana. He has navigated all these western waters in every variety of craft, from the bark canoe to the magnificent steamboat. He has slept with the Indian in his wigwam, and long before the age of turnpikes and of railroads he has followed the trail of the buffalo and the Indian through the forests and prairies of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. He has witnessed with his own eye the marvelous change which American enterprise aided by the power of steam has wrought in causing the wilderness to be converted into a beautiful garden, and the desert to blossom as the rose. No man in this House, and few men in the country anywhere, has realized so vividly the truth that as my venerable friend from the Evansville district. He knows it all by heart like a book, and I shall be very glad indeed if on this question he will enlighten the House in reference to his experience fully upon these western localities, not only in respect to Cairo, but Mound City, St. Louis, Carondelet, New Albany, and other points. I should like especially if he would tell us about some of his sad experiences at Cairo; and in this connection I would be glad if he would speak upon the mosquito question. If I remember correctly, on one occasion he told me of passing down the Ohio to that far-famed city, and of the boat on which he was riding being landed next to the third story of one of the fashionable hotels in that celebrated watering place. [Laughter.] My friend here says it was the second story. Well, sir, I may have got one story too high, but I am certain he told me that in the very heart of the city the cry of the faithful boatman was "No bottom!"

Now, sir, hoping that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine may be accepted I will not detain the House longer at this time.

Mr. CRAVENS. I now desire to yield the floor for one moment to my friend from the Evansville district.

Mr. LAW. I must confess that I have been somewhat astonished at the views which have been expressed by the gentleman from Illinois upon the question now before the House, especially in consideration of the fact that it is well known there are various localities on the western waters which desire an examination with the view of an establishment of a navy-yard. I am surprised that, under these circumstances, he should propose to shut off all investigation at the outset and confine himself to a single point. I know of no fairer method of proceeding in this matter than that a commission should be appointed by the Navy Department, which should examine and take into consideration the advantages possessed by each one of these points, and their report, I have no doubt, would probably settle the question.

There are certain facts in connection with the establishment of a navy-yard upon our western waters which may probably have been forgotten. Some fifteen or twenty years ago a commissioner was appointed by Congress to locate a navy-yard upon our western waters. After full examination the location was fixed at Evansville. That point was selected in preference to Cairo for the reason that at that time the whole country about Cairo was inundated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to ask my friend from Indiana whether, if a navy-yard had actually been established at Evansville, it might not have been in about the same condition now as the marine hospital there for which he wanted $38,000 the other day to preserve it from immediate destruction?

Mr. LAW. That does not follow. I do not know where a commission to be appointed would locate this naval depot. The only thing I ask is that the location shall be determined on after an investigation into the merits of these different points. The circumstance alluded to by my friend from Indiana was one which did substantially occur. I recollect very well the boat which I was on landing at the second story of a cabin at Cairo where we took our breakfast. The whole country about there was inundated at that time. Very great improvements have been made there, however, since, and it may be that a naval depot might be properly located there. I am not going to say anything in derogation of the town of Cairo. I have some very good friends there for whom I have very great respect. The only thing I ask is that the proposition of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be adopted, so that everybody may have a hearing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana will recollect that this proposition comes from the Senate. It is not my proposition. If the House sees fit to adopt the amendment which has been submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs I have no objection.

Mr. LAW. I do not care where it comes from. It is a local measure that ought not to be considered by the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana will remember that I have agreed that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine may be adopted, and give Evansville and every other place a chance.

Mr. LAW. What objection, I desire to know, is there to the appointment of a commission?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have said over and over again that I have no objection to it, and I presume there will be no objection to it if we can have a vote on it.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the evening session be set apart for the purpose of debating this question after it is disposed of. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAW. If it is understood that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is to be adopted, I will not detain the House by further remarks. Before yielding the floor, however, for the purpose of allowing the claims of Evansville to be placed before the House I will ask that the memorial of the citizens of that place may be read. The Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

MEMORIAL.

Evansville, the chief commercial city of Indiana, the best site for the western navy-yard.

The mayor and common council of the city of Evansville, Indiana, respectfully request the congressional committee charged with the duty of locating a western armory and navy-yard to visit Evansville, for the purpose of considering its superior advantages over all other sites for the above works.

We take the liberty, in a spirit looking to the general welfare, to suggest the more striking advantages and facilities presented by Evansville for the location of the proposed navy-yard and armory. We also take great pleasure in tendering to the committee the hospitalities of the city and its inhabitants during their sojourn with us, pledging ourselves to furnish every facility for a fair and candid investigation.

Situation of Evansville.

Evansville is the principal commercial city of Indiana. It is situated on the Ohio river, in latitude 38° 8' north, and 87° 29' west. The altitude at Evansville of the Ohio river, at low-water mark, is three hundred and twenty feet above the level of the Gulf of Mexico at the outlet of the Mississippi.

The city is situated on an elevated plain, or second bottom of the Ohio river, and is entirely above the highest flood.

Geographical and geological location.

The geographical and geological location of Evansville is extremely favorable to a large commercial and manufacturing city, and peculiarly adapted for the site of the proposed national works. It is situated about equidistant from the fall of the Ohio and the mouth of the river, about two hundred miles each way. It is almost the center of the great valley of the Mississippi, and consequently of the Union. It is above all serious obstructions in the Ohio river, which is always navigable for boats of all classes from Evansville to the mouth. It possesses a river front unsurpassed in beauty of location and in excellence of harbor. Just below the city, at various points, are locations accessible to the largest boats, perfectly adapted to a navy-yard. Here vessels of any size may be launched with perfect safety. In all stages of the river there is always fifty feet of water in the channel.

The population of Evansville is now about twenty thousand, and is steadily on the increase. Its progress has been remarkable. In 1847 a city charter was obtained, and in 1850 the population was about five thousand; in 1857 it was twelve thousand two hundred and fifty; to-day it is twenty thousand.

The people of Evansville are industrious, enterprising, intelligent, and patriotic. The existing war has brought many excellent citizens hither from Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and other States. Evansville is noted for its excellent public schools, being the only city in the State which now enjoys this priceless advantage. The operatives of the navy-yard could, at reasonable rates, secure comfortable residences, and their families could enjoy, without charge, the inestimable benefit of a superior education. The rates of living here are as cheap as in any city of the West.

Evansville is the southern terminus of the great Wabash and Erie canal. This is the longest canal in the world—four hundred and sixty-two miles. Its northern terminus is Toledo, Ohio. It opens an outlet which, under proper control and management, would most cheaply and conveniently transport the products of the South to the northern lakes.

The Evansville and Crawfordsville railroad, completed to Rockville, Indiana, and passing through Terre Haute, is one hundred and thirty-eight miles long. It connects with the Ohio and Mississippi road at Vincennes, and with the Terre Haute and Alton and the Terre Haute and Richmond railroads at Terre Haute, which connections furnish a railroad communication in every direction. This road will shortly be extended to Attica, giving a through connection, with the Wabash Valley road, to the lakes, and thence to New York. The Evansville, Indianapolis, and Cleveland Straight-Line railroad is graded to the crossing of the Ohio and Mississippi railroad, and, it is understood, will soon be completed to that point, opening up a rich country, abounding in mineral wealth and the most desirable timber. Green river penetrates the State of Kentucky several hundred miles, and, with its tributaries, is navigable, at all seasons, two hundred and ninety miles. Its mouth is nine miles above Evansville and its trade finds here its natural depot.

Evansville is also the natural depot for the Wabash river. It empties into the Ohio forty miles below, and the cargoes transported down it are transhipped here for New Orleans or New York.

Mineral and geological advantages.

Evansville is situated on a bed of coal. Just below the city extensive mines have been opened, which furnish coal, in ordinary times, at seven or eight cents per bushel. Coal is found all along the Ohio from Cannelton to Tradewater, and all along the Wabash and Erie canal for a hundred miles, and all along Green river from its mouth to its fountain. At Adria, on Green river, sixty miles by water, is established one of the largest iron works in Kentucky. Near Bloomfield, on the Wabash and Erie canal, is "Richland Furnace," the largest iron works in Indiana, and surrounded by the largest deposits of iron ore in the State. The slaty clays found along the southeastern and southwestern margins of the Ohio river contain extensive deposits of clay ironstone, an ore easily smelted into pig iron. Valuable and extensive deposits of hydrated brown oxyd of iron also exist in various places. Limestone is abundant in the whole region, and its importance cannot be overrated.

Hemp.

To a navy-yard, hemp is an important and indispensable article. Kentucky probably raises more hemp than any other State. The natural depot of this article for the most productive part of the State is here. It comes to us in its raw state, and is hence sent to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk, for manufacture. Why should not the freight on this bulky article be saved by the Government, by its manufacture here? The hazard and cost of transportation would be saved to the grower, while the Government would save the cost of transportation between the manufactured article and the raw material. No city furnishes greater advantages for securing this article than Evansville.

Timber.

The region around Evansville abounds in the finest timber for naval purposes. Along the banks of Green river is found oak, chestnut, and hickory in inexhaustible quantities; and these timbers, of the best quality, abound all through southern Indiana. Timber can be floated to this point from Green river and points above on the Ohio at small cost, and can also be brought by rail and on the Wabash and Erie canal.

Manufactories and machine shops.

Evansville is noted for the enterprise and skill of its manufacturers and machinists. Here are many extensive saw-mills and vast foundries and machine shops. Every species of work can be turned out here as cheaply and as well as anywhere on the continent. Skilled mechanics can be had in any branch of labor.

Conclusion.

Your memorialists, in conclusion, suggest for your consideration the fact that the great West, on which this Government now leans for support, has never received from the Government its proper share of national works. The time has arrived when its rights, in view of the public interest, cannot longer be disregarded. The State of Indiana has not been an unimportant beggar at the national Treasury. While she has fulfilled every obligation and performed every duty, she has pressed no claim and received no favor. Her chief commercial city speaks her voice to-day when she proclaims that her people are loyal, patriotic, and devoted to the Union. In the name of the State of Indiana we ask that her services and rights may be recognized, and that the public interest, in which she has so vast a share, may be served by the establishment of a navy-yard at this her chief commercial emporium. We do not wish to disparage the claims of other cities of Indiana; but it is plain that their locations are so far above the mouth of the Ohio, and communication with them is so precarious, that the location of such works at any one of them is impracticable. At this point, so convenient to Kentucky, so accessible to all points on the Tennessee, Cumberland, and lower Mississippi rivers, at this geographical center of the United States, at this point, in our opinion, these works should be located. It is apparent that at this time, and in view of the probable future course of events, here is the place for the western navy-yard. We invite your candid attention to this point, and we are confident of your favorable judgment.

WM. MIDLS,

Members of the Council.

State of Indiana, Vanderburgh County,
City of Evansville, ss:

I, Adolph Pfafflin, clerk of the common council of the city of Evansville, do hereby certify that the foregoing memorial was adopted and signed by the mayor and common council of said city, on the 1st April, 1864.

Witness my hand and the seal of said city, hereto affixed, this 1st day of April, 1864.

ADOLPH PFAFFLIN, Clerk.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine by adding after the word "tortuous," the words "and also the most approved site for a navy-yard and naval station for iron-clad vessels on or near the Atlantic coast."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not germane to the amendment now to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order.

The amendment submitted by Mr. FIFE was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. STILES. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to John Kline and Charles W. Carrigan, contestants and claimants for seats in this House, whose claims have been adversely decided, the usual pay and mileage up to said adverse decisions, respectively.

Objection was made.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at half past five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 25, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, residents and owners of property on C street north, between Second and Sixth streets west, remonstrating against the proposed charter for a double track street railroad between the Baltimore and Ohio railroad depot and the steamboat landing, running through the limits of C street above described; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Rev. Byron Sunderland and others, citizens of Washington, praying that the running of street cars and the sale of newspapers in the streets of Washington on Sundays may be prohibited; which was ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 12, 1863, a statistical and general report upon the value and present condition of our foreign and domestic commerce, including that of the Pacific coast; and a motion by Mr. MORGAN that the report be printed and that five thousand additional copies thereof be printed was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 445) to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and recommend that it pass. I will say, with the leave of the Senate, in regard to this bill, that it consolidates most of the acts now in force upon the subject-matter of the bill, and is deemed by the Navy Department, and by all who are conversant with the subject, as being of importance. It will save a great deal of money if it can be passed during the present session. It has passed under the supervision of the Department, and also under the very close supervision of the judge of the district court and the attorney for the district of the State of Massachusetts, both of whom are very familiar with the administration of prize law. I shall call it up with the permission of the Senate at an early day, and hope to have action upon it before we adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 552) to increase the salaries of the judges and arbitrators appointed under the treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the slave trade, to report it without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. As this is a House bill, I think perhaps it had better be acted upon now so that it may be taken from our Calendar. It will take no time.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 549) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

HENRY W. DIMAN.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 66) to provide for the adjustment of the accounts of Henry W. Diman, to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. It will create no debate and no opposition.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the claims of Henry W. Diman, late acting assistant paymaster in the Navy, whose books and papers were sunk and lost in a transport steamer in July, 1862, in the Mississippi river, according to the principles of equity and justice.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 190) to establish a navy-yard and depot at Cairo, in the State of Illinois, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and

A joint resolution (No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States.

NAVY-YARD AT CAIRO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 190) to establish a navy-yard and depot at Cairo, in the State of Illinois; and on motion by Mr. HALE they were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SALARIES FOR POSTMASTERS.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move to dispense with all previous orders for the purpose of taking up the bill in relation to the Post Office Department which I called up the other day for consideration. I fancy there will be no debate about it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 332) to establish salaries for postmasters, and for other purposes.

It proposes that the annual compensation of postmasters shall be at a fixed salary, in lieu of commissions, to be divided into five classes, exclusive of the postmaster of the city of New York. Postmasters of the first class are to receive not more than $4,000 nor less than $3,000; postmasters of the second class are to receive less than $3,000 and not less than $2,000; postmasters of the third class are to receive less than $2,000 and not less than $1,000; postmasters of the fourth class are to receive less than $1,000 and not less than $100; postmasters of the fifth class are to receive less than $100. The compensation of the postmaster of New York is to be $6,000 per annum, to take effect on the 1st of July, 1864. The compensation of postmasters of the several classes named are to be established by the Postmaster General under the rules hereinafter provided. Whenever the compensation of postmasters of the several offices (except the office of New York) for the two consecutive years next preceding the 1st of July, 1864, shall have amounted to an average annual sum not less than $3,000, such offices are to be assigned to the first class; whenever it shall have amounted to less than $3,000, but not less than $2,000, such offices are to be assigned to the second class; whenever it shall have amounted to less than $2,000, but not less than $1,000, such offices are to be assigned to the third class; whenever it shall have amounted to less than $1,000, but not less than $100, such offices are to be assigned to the fourth class; and whenever it shall have amounted to less than $100, such offices are to be assigned to the fifth class. To offices of the first, second, and third classes are to be severally assigned salaries in even hundreds of dollars, as nearly as practicable in amount the same as, but not exceeding, the average compensation of the postmasters for the two years next preceding; and to offices of the fourth class are to be assigned severally salaries in even tens of dollars, as nearly as practicable in amount the same as, but not exceeding, such average compensation for the two years next preceding; and to offices of the fifth class are to be severally assigned salaries in even dollars, as nearly as practicable in amount the same as, but not exceeding, such average compensation for the two years next preceding. Wherever returns showing the average of annual compensation of postmasters for the two years next preceding the 1st of July, 1864, shall not have been received at the Post Office Department at the time of adjustment, they may be estimated by the Postmaster General for the purpose of adjusting the salaries of postmasters herein provided for. It is to be the duty of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department to obtain from postmasters their quarterly accounts, with the vouchers necessary to their correct adjustment, and to report to the Postmaster General all failures of postmasters to render such returns within a proper period after the close of each quarter.

The second section provides that the Postmaster General shall review once in two years, and in special cases upon satisfactory representation as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust on the basis of the preceding section, the salary assigned by him to any office; but any change made in such salary is not to take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order. And all orders made assigning or changing salaries are to be made in writing and recorded in his journal, and notified to the Auditor for the Post Office Department.

The third section provides that salaries of the first, second, and third classes shall be adjusted to take effect on the 1st of July, 1864, and of the fourth and fifth classes at the same time, or at the commencement of a quarter as early as practicable thereafter.

The fourth section provides that at offices which have not been established for two years prior to the 1st of July, 1864, the salary may be adjusted upon a satisfactory return by the postmaster of the receipts, expenditures, and business of his office; but fifty per cent. of the gross revenue of such office is to be in all cases the largest amount allowed to such postmasters for their salaries, respectively, except in cases where it shall be a separating or distributing office, as provided for in the sixth section of this bill.

The fifth section provides that at the post office of New York and offices of the first and second classes, the Postmaster General shall allow to the postmaster a just and reasonable sum for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, of rent, fuel, lights, and clerks, to be adjusted upon a satisfactory exhibit of the facts. All offices of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, such expenses are to be paid by the postmaster, except as provided in the sixth section; it being intended that such allowances shall be made in accordance with existing usages.

The sixth section provides that the Postmaster General may designate certain convenient offices, at the intersection of mail routes, as distributing offices, and certain others as separating offices; and where any such office is of the third, fourth, or fifth class of post offices, he may make a reasonable allowance to such postmaster for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, of clerical services arising from such duties.

The seventh section provides that all postages and box rents at post offices, and all other receipts and emoluments at a post office, shall be received and accounted for as a part of the postal revenues; and any part thereof which the postmaster ought to have collected but has neglected to collect is to be charged against him in his account, and he is to be liable therefor in the same manner as if it had been collected; and he is to receive no fees or perquisites beyond his salary.

The eighth section provides that the uniform rate of United States postage, without reference to distance, upon letters and other mailable matter addressed to or received from foreign countries, when forwarded from or received in the United States by steamships or other vessels regularly employed in the transportation of the mails, shall be as follows, namely: ten cents per single rate of half an ounce or under, on letters; two cents each on newspapers; and the established domestic rates on pamphlets, periodicals, and other articles of printed matter; which postage is to be prepaid on matter sent, and collected on matter received; but these rates are not to apply to letters or other mailable matter addressed to or received from any foreign place or country, to and from which different rates of postage have been or shall be established by international postal convention or arrangement already concluded or hereafter to be made.

The ninth section authorizes the Postmaster General to sell, or cause to be sold, to individuals, corporations, and business firms, postage stamps, in quantities of not less than $100 in value, at a discount not exceeding five per cent. from the face value of such stamps, and to sell, or cause to be sold, stamped envelopes, in packages containing not less than five hundred envelopes, at a discount not exceeding five per cent. from the current prices thereof when sold in less quantities.

The tenth section proposes to amend the twenty-eighth section of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1863, by the addition of the following clause, namely: And when any letter bearing a request for its return to the writer, in case of its non-delivery, shall have been so returned to the office at which it was originally mailed, then, and in that case, it shall be obligatory upon the person to whom such letter has been returned to receive the same, and to pay therefor the postage specified by this section; and in default of said writer to receive and pay for the letter so returned, he shall be subject to a penalty of ten dollars, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The eleventh section provides that if any person not authorized by the Postmaster General shall set up or profess to keep any office, or any place of business bearing the sign, name, or title of post office, every such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500 for every such offense.

The twelfth section provides that if any person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment shall unlawfully detain, delay, or open, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he shall be entrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post, or to be carried or delivered by any mail carrier, mail messenger, letter carrier, route agent, or other person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment of the United States, or to be forwarded or delivered through or from any post office or branch post office established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States, if any such person shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy, any letter or packet intrusted to him, and which shall not contain any security for or assurance relating to money, every such offender, being duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $300, or imprisoned not less than six months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense. If any person so employed shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he or she shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his or her possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, or to be carried or delivered by any mail carrier, mail messenger, letter carrier, route agent, or other person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment of the United States, or to be forwarded or delivered through or from any post office or branch post office established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States, such letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, containing any note, bond, draft, check, revenue stamp, postage stamp, money order, certificate of stock, or other pecuniary obligation, or Government security of any description whatever, issued, or that may hereafter be issued by the United States, or by any officer or fiscal agent thereof, any bank note or bank post bill, bill of exchange, warrant of the Treasury of the United States, note of assignment of stock in the funds, letters of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, or for selling stock in the funds, or for receiving the interest thereof, or any letter of credit, or note for, or relating to, payment of money, or any bond, or warrant, draft, bill, or promissory note, covenant, contract, or agreement whatsoever, for, or relating to, the payment of money, or the delivery of any article of value, or the performance of any act, matter, or thing, or any receipt, release, acquittance, or discharge of, or from, any debt, covenant, or demand, or any part thereof, or any copy of any record of any judgment, or decree, in any court of law, or equity, or any execution which may have issued thereon, or any copy of any other record, or any other article of value, or any writing representing the same; or if any such person shall steal, or take, any of the same out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, that shall come to his or her possession, whether such letter or packet, bag or mail of letters shall have come or been placed in his or her possession to be forwarded or delivered in the regular course of his or her official duties, or shall have come or been placed in his or her possession in any other manner, and provided that such letter or packet, bag or mail of letters shall not have been delivered to the person or persons to whom it is directed, such person shall, on conviction for any such offense, be imprisoned not less than ten years nor exceeding twenty-one years; and the fact that any such letter or packet, bag or mail of letters shall have been deposited in any post office or branch post office established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States, or in any other authorized depository of mail letters, or in charge of any postmaster, assistant postmaster, clerk, carrier, agent, or messenger employed in the post office establishment of the United States, is to be taken and held as evidence that the same was "intended to be conveyed by post" within the meaning of this statute; and if any person who shall have taken charge of the mails of the United States shall voluntarily quit or desert them before such person delivers it into the post office kept at the termination of the route, or some known mail carrier, or agent of the General Post Office, authorized to receive them, every such person, so offending, is to forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding $500 for every such offense; and if any person concerned in carrying the mail of the United States shall collect, receive, or carry any letter or packet, or shall cause or procure the same to be done, contrary to this act, every such offender is to forfeit and pay, for every such offense, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars.—Section twenty-one, act of March 3, 1825.

The thirteenth section provides that dead letters containing valuable inclosures shall be registered in the Department; and when it appears that they can neither be delivered to their address nor to the writers, the contents, so far as available, are to be used to promote the efficiency of the dead letter office, according to the provisions of the seventh section of the act approved February 27, 1861, entitled "An act to establish certain post routes;" and the amount is to be shown in the annual report, and be subject to reclamation by either the party addressed or by the sender for four years from registry, careful account being kept of them. All other letters deemed of value or of importance to the party addressed, or to the writer, and which it appears cannot be returned to either destination, are to be disposed of as the Postmaster General shall direct.

The fourteenth section provides that letter-carriers shall be employed at such post offices as the Postmaster General shall direct, for the delivery of letters, in the places, respectively, where such post offices are established; and for their services they are severally to receive a salary to be prescribed by the Postmaster General, not exceeding $800 per year; but, on satisfactory evidence of their diligence, fidelity, and experience as carriers, the Postmaster General may increase their respective salaries from time to time to any sum not exceeding $1,000; and each of the carriers is to give bond, with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster General, for the safe custody and delivery of all letters, packets, and moneys received by him.

The fifteenth section provides that all expenses for the letter-carriers, branch offices, and receiving boxes, or incident thereto, shall be entered and reported in a separate account from the ordinary postal expenses of such post office, and shall be shown in comparison with the proceeds of the postages on local mail matter at each office, in order that the Postmaster General may be guided in the expenditures for that branch of the postal service by income derived therefrom.

The sixteenth section proposes to repeal the eighth, eleventh, fourteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth sections of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1863, the provisions of which have been modified and incorporated in this bill.

The seventeenth section provides that the special agent of the Post Office Department in the Pacific States and Territories shall receive as compensation five dollars per diem.

Mr. HALE. I understand that the bill which the Secretary has been reading is printed as an amendment to a House bill. I do not understand it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say in explanation to the Senator that when the post route bill was pending in the Senate, at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in the House of Representatives, I presented this measure, which was a House bill reported unanimously from that committee, that it might be referred to the proper committee of this body, and offered as an amendment to the post route bill. The rules of the House made it quite impossible for them to take it up there as an original bill at this time. The committee of this body, of which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] is chairman, concluded not to join the two bills together, and reported the post route bill and it passed the Senate, and then concluded upon full consideration of this measure to report it as an original bill by the committee, it having been previously considered by the corresponding committee of the other House and unanimously reported to that body, so that it stands as an original bill, having been fully and carefully considered.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if this bill increases the compensation of postmasters or increases the expenses of that Department.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not understand it as increasing the expenses. It is resolving commissions into salaries. They are to receive salaries which are to be fixed by ascertaining how much their receipts have been during the past two years, and the salaries are to be averaged by that.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say in addition to the Senator that the plan it proposes is this: it makes all postmasters salaried officers in lieu of being paid by commissions, and it classifies the postmasters according to the business done at their offices. The amount to be paid as a salary will be ascertained from the average compensation by commissions for the past two years. If, however, the business of any particular office should decrease, the office is to be taken from the higher class that it was in and placed in a lower class. If it should increase, it will be taken from the lower class in which it was in and placed in a higher class, this being subject to a regulation of the Department and not requiring congressional action. It is not intended to increase or diminish the salaries of the postmasters, but it fixes a round sum for their salaries as near as can be ascertained. It is also intended to supersede the necessity of the keeping of the accounts upon which the present salaries are based, and to simplify the whole proceedings. It is a bill in substance such as passed this body two years ago. It has been carefully matured by the Postmaster General. It has been agreed to, as Mr. ALLEY, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House of Representatives has informed me, unanimously by that committee, and they believe it will not only simplify the business, but very much cheapen the cost of the Department without in any manner injuring the public service.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads what is the advantage in paying these postmasters a salary instead of a commission.

Mr. COLLAMER. It will simplify the keeping, rendering, and settling of their accounts. If any gentleman will examine into the form of the blanks furnished for the keeping of the accounts in the various post offices in the United States, the great number and complication of those accounts which are sent up quarterly and the account of labor required in the examination of those accounts in the Department here, and the great number of men employed in it, he will find that three fourths of all that work is done merely to get at the commissions of the postmasters, and if you give them a fixed salary you dispense with all that machinery. That is the great object.

Mr. HALE. It may be so, but I confess I do not see it so, because the bill imposes upon the Postmaster General the necessity of ascertaining what the amount of the compensation of each postmaster shall be. For instance, the second section provides:

That the Postmaster General shall review once in two years, and in special cases upon satisfactory representation as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust, on the basis of the preceding section, the salary assigned by him to any office.

How will it be possible for the Postmaster General to examine this matter every two years and to readjust the compensation unless he keeps an account of the commissions as he did before?

Mr. COLLAMER. Under this bill establishing the salary system, the postmaster of course is required to keep an account of his receipts, all he receives and all he pays out, and to render that account quarterly. He will not have to make up these complicated accounts, but a record simply of receipts and expenditures. The accounts that will be required by this bill of the postmasters are pretty much all kept now, inasmuch as the business is done by the prepayment of letter postage or stamps. It is not therefore requisite for the postmaster to keep such accounts as were formerly kept. The former necessities for them have been reduced simply to the keeping of those accounts with all their complications to get at the commission of the postmaster. Now if he will keep an account simply of what he has received and what he has paid out for each quarter, that will furnish to the Postmaster General the element or material out of which he can see whether the business and duties of that office have increased, and therefore he can arrange it in the proper class by means of the new improvements which are thus required to be furnished under this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if this bill increases the discretion of the Postmaster General over this subject further than that discretion now exists under the present law. I thought by the reading of the bill that there was a great deal of discretion left to him in regard to this compensation, and in regard to the consideration of cases that might be brought up before him. For one, I do not wish to increase that discretion. We have an immense number of postmasters in the country. I think they are always under the control, more or less, of the Postmaster General, and I do not wish to increase his discretion over everything. I wish to fix these salaries by positive law. It seems to me that this arrangement of postmasters into classes is an admirable arrangement if it is made the positive duty of the Postmaster General to adjust them every two years. I do not like to leave anything to the discretion of any of the Secretaries more than can be helped.

Mr. CONNESS. There is not any.

Mr. COLLAMER. The inquiry of the gentleman properly is, whether it leaves more to the discretion of the Postmaster General, not whether it increases the measure of discretion already existing in him. He is directed, to be sure, by this bill to fix these salaries according to the income of the past two years, but he may hereafter, and it is his duty as often as every two years, to divide them and arrange them into classes according to the increase or the diminution of the receipts of the offices. It is true, in doing that there is a measure of discretion, and, although he cannot now change the amount of a postmaster's income by any order he can make under this bill, provided the information furnished to him by the quarterly returns of the post office showed that the postmaster was doing a larger amount of business, he could increase it. The mode and measure by which he would govern his discretion in making that new classification of them from time to time would depend entirely upon regulations to be fixed by himself; so that you may say there is rather more left to his judicial discretion than there is now.

Mr. HALE. I observe that there is a provision here requiring the postmasters to account for all the box rents, and I wish to ask whether that is not an alteration of the present law. Is that the present law?

Mr. COLLAMER. It is in some cases. In large offices where they are able from their commissions to pay all the expenses of the offices and a great deal more, as in Philadelphia and New York, they return everything they receive, box rents and all; but generally in post offices they do not. The postmasters set up the boxes themselves and take the pay for them. At present it is part of the emoluments of their office, they being at the expense of putting up the boxes, and they take that themselves. But it will be observed that under this bill the Postmaster General is to ascertain the total receipts and expenditures of each office for two years past, and to fix the salary of the postmaster by that standard, so that he receives the pay for the box rents in the estimate of his salary for the coming time; that is if he renders an account of those box rents, as I suppose it is understood he would. That is the way I understand the bill.

Mr. HALE. I think that is rather an unwise provision, for in the small towns, where the incomes of the offices are very small, the postmaster puts up these boxes as a matter of convenience to the inhabitants, and he puts the pay and emoluments from that source in his own pocket and does not return them as part of his compensation. It is a convenience to those who frequent the post office quite as much or more than it is to the postmaster. The result will be that in these small places where the compensation is but very slight, if you compel the postmaster to account for these boxes, the boxes will not be furnished. That will be the result, it seems to me.

Mr. CONNESS. If it were to result in that way in the small towns it would be a great benefit indeed to the service. In the small towns there is no use for boxes in fact at all, if there is a prompt and ready delivery. I have known instances myself frequently where boxes were established and they were made to discriminate against the general delivery. There was only one person to deliver and no man could get out a letter until the customers of the postmaster for boxes had helped themselves.

Mr. HALE. That may be so in San Francisco.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at San Francisco. I would have the Senator understand that the post office at San Francisco is as well regulated an office and one of larger revenues than any in his State, perhaps as large as all of his State put together.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, some years ago when I was on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, that was one of the allegations, made against the postmaster at San Francisco.

Mr. CONNESS. I have known it as an abuse very general in small offices where boxes were really not necessary at all, yet they were resorted to as a means of increasing the revenue and compensation of the postmaster when he could have delivered promptly at the window every letter in a short time, and let all the citizens take their chances or come in rotation as they made their appearance. This little system of perquisites is really a nuisance in many of the small towns, and is founded on nothing in the world but the cupidity of the postmaster. Where the business of an office amounts to a sufficient sum to require the establishment of boxes for any useful purpose, then it is perfectly right that a record of the box rents should be kept, and then it should enter perhaps into his proper perquisites. But if the tendency of this change should be to rule out the system of boxes where they are not needed, there could be no greater improvement. I have seen the people constantly dissatisfied because when their mail came they could not be waited upon until those who had paid an extra compensation to the postmaster had first been provided for. It is a great wrong.

Mr. HALE. The system of boxes as I have seen it practiced is very different from anything like that. I could illustrate it by the town in which I live. I think the postmaster there has something like two hundred boxes; I cannot give the exact number.

Mr. CONNESS. That is a large office.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no, it is not. He has something like two hundred boxes. As fast as the mail is received it is placed in these boxes; every man knows his own box because he knows his number; and it is a great advantage. If there is anything in his box he sees it and goes to the window and takes it, and everything is delivered at one general delivery. There is no difference between those that have boxes and those that have not in regard to the delivery. The advantage is in notifying the people outside that go to the office that there are letters there for them, and they get them. There have never been any complaints of the system that I ever heard of, and it is a very great accommodation indeed.

Mr. CONNESS. There could be no difficulty about the arrangement that the Senator speaks of. He now contemplates what are called "lock boxes" that may be opened from the outside. Those cannot be furnished in small offices. They cost too much to set them up. This provision does not apply to boxes as large and considerable as where there are two hundred boxes. That is a very large office with an extensive business. But this system of boxes, I will suggest to the Senator, is very often carried on having boxes in the shape of pigeon holes on the inside; there is no access to them from without; and the postmaster cannot attend to the general delivery while he is attending to the box delivery.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to ask whether it takes any longer time to deposit the letters in these pigeon holes, as they are called, than in any other receptacle.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

Mr. DIXON. Then their being placed in boxes is no inconvenience. The Senator from New Hampshire is perfectly right about that.

Mr. CONNESS. The only difficulty is in regard to the delivery.

Mr. HALE. But there is not the slightest difficulty in the delivery. If this seventh section were amended so as not to include the rents for lock boxes I should have no objection to it, but it is so broad now that it covers all these boxes. The result would be that the postmasters in all these towns where they have twenty-five, fifty, one hundred, or one hundred and fifty boxes would discontinue them, simply because you take away the pay. It would be no benefit to the Government and a great disadvantage to the community. I will move to amend the seventh section in the second line, by striking out the words "and box rents at post offices;" so that the section will read:

That all postages and all other receipts and emoluments at a post office shall be received and accounted for as a part of the postal revenues, &c.

Mr. COLLAMER. If those words are stricken out the postmasters of our large cities where there are very large amounts received for box rents, enough to pay their salaries four or five times over, will not be required to account for them.

Mr. HALE. Name some limit. I would be glad if the Senator would make the proper amendment to carry out my object.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot do that. This is a bill reported from my own committee, and I do not think it necessary to amend it.

Mr. HALE. I move that the bill lie over until to-morrow. It is an important measure making a total change in the policy of the Government from its foundation. We have always paid commissions to postmasters.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, this measure has been very deliberately considered; as much so as the Senator considers naval bills in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it has been considered by two committees, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in this body, and the same committee in the other House. It is the deliberate product of the Department. There has been no bill before this body that has been more carefully considered. Because the Senator from New Hampshire does not understand its operation in one particular, he asks that it lie over at this stage of the session. I appeal to the Senator not to take that course in reference to business that comes from other committees of this body.

Mr. HALE. I did not know that there was any comity due to committees against a fair examination and discussion of their bills. I am willing to give every committee of the body all that is due to them; but certainly the Senate take the liberty, sometimes, of overruling the decisions of committees, and I think I have had as much of that sort of experience as anybody.

Mr. CONNESS. Perhaps you deserved it.

Mr. HALE. I do not doubt that I deserved it. All I ask of my brother Senators who are favored with clearer intellects and greater capacity is that they allow some of their measures to be examined that we may see what they are. I do not want to make any factious opposition.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am sure the gentleman has no thought of that kind. I wish to make a single remark about box rents. Among the provisions of this bill is one very important one, contained in one of the latter sections, providing for the personal delivery of letters. The Postmaster General has commenced that system in the larger cities and is going on with it very successfully; but there was a limitation in the former law that he should not employ carriers and make these deliveries unless the local business of the office in that neighborhood would pay the expense of it. We never can expect the local business to pay the expenses in the beginning of the system. But in this bill that limitation in regard to the local business of the office is taken off, and it is the present intention of the Department to deliver letters in even the small-sized villages of the country, to carry them to the house of the person to whom they are addressed and deliver them personally all over this country. He believes he can do it successfully and make it pay its way. Not in the very scattered settlements where they never use any boxes, but in all those places where they would be likely to use boxes, it is expected that there will be established in the course of a year or two a system of personal delivery of letters to almost everybody, if you will let this bill pass at the present time. Boxes then will be a matter of very little consequence.

Mr. HALE. Do you mean that the postmaster or letter-carrier is to deliver the letters without additional postage?

Mr. COLLAMER. I do mean just that. I will undertake to assure the gentleman with the utmost confidence that if this bill is passed the Department will not merely in the city of Dover, where he resides, deliver letters at his house twice a day, but in all our considerable villages and towns throughout the country there will be at least one delivery a day without any additional expense whatever; and the Postmaster General can make money by it, as he says. I do not vouch for that, but I think he will make the delivery.

Mr. HALE. I confess I do not know enough about this matter to put my objections against the superior experience of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is what we want this bill to try.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to postpone the bill withdrawn?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the seventh section of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw that and move to insert in the third line of that section after the word "post office" the words "where the rent of boxes shall exceed $200," so that it will read:

That all postages and box rents at post offices, and all other receipts and emoluments at a post office, where the rent of boxes shall exceed $200, shall be received and accounted for as a part of the postal revenues.

Mr. DIXON. That will defeat one of the objects of the bill, which is to simplify the accounts and to render any accounts of that description unnecessary. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HALE. He has to keep an account of the box rents now to make up the amount of his compensation.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the experiment which is intended to be entered upon more fully under this bill, it seems to me, will be put in jeopardy by any such amendment as this. Take the villages of New England, if you please, even as large as those that have $1,000 income, and I do not believe the box rents amount to $200, or anything like that. If the Postmaster General chooses to establish a personal delivery by carriers in that village, you dispense entirely with the use of boxes and box rents. I do not want the postmaster at the place of delivery, who is himself interested in doing so, to frustrate that plan, and if you let him keep his box rents up to the amount of $200 without accounting for them he will be slow to aid the experiment of delivering the letters personally to those to whom they are addressed. He will want to keep up his boxes so that he can make money out of them, instead of having the system which the Department desire to establish; that is, the system of personal delivery. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the bill as reported disposes of the subject of boxes very properly. I think the revenue resulting from boxes ought to be reported as a part of the revenue of the Department. In my little town the postmaster has boxes in the form of pigeon-holes with glass in front, each one numbered, and it is just as easy for him to distribute his mail among those boxes to each man's number as it is in any other form, and for his own economy of time and his own convenience he establishes these boxes without any compensation or charge for them; and that is the way it operates. It operates for his convenience and his economy of time, and for the convenience of the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a question with regard to making the letter-carriers salaried officers instead of receiving their pay for carrying it. I believe that is a rule that has been lately adopted.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have heard numerous complaints—I do not know how well founded they are—that there has been a marked decline in the diligence with which letters have been delivered since that system was adopted. People do not get their letters nearly as promptly or nearly as certainly as they did when the letter-carrier depended upon his postage for compensation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT INSANE HOSPITAL.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate passed a few days since a little bill in regard to the Insane Asylum, an exact transcript of which has been passed by the House of Representatives, but with a different title. I ask the Senate to take up that House bill in order to put it through the legislative forms. There is not the slightest deviation in the bill from the bill which we have already passed. It is House bill No. 554, to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane by an exchange of land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that bill has not yet been reported.

Mr. GRIMES. I am authorized to report it from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Chair calls up for consideration the special order of the day, being the civil appropriation bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that that bill be passed over informally by common consent until we dispose of this little bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and House bill No. 554 is before the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. MORRILL, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the Senate (No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the Senate (No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference report and recommend as follows:

1. That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and agree to the same with the following amendment, that is to say:

In section second of the bill as amended by the House, strike out the word "consular" before the word "officer," so that it will read, "may apply to any officer of the United States duly authorized to act in the premises."

2. That the House of Representatives agree to the above amendment to their amendment of the Senate bill.

L. M. MORRILL,

JOHN C. TEN EYCK,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,

W. HIGBY,

Managers on the part of the House.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed upon a report which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I really think it is hardly worth while for that long report to be read, because the amendments will be simply indicated by their numbers and we cannot understand it. If the Senator will explain to us how eight or ten of the leading topics have been disposed of, I believe it would be much more satisfactory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate feel disposed to dispense with the reading of the report—the report I believe is correct so far as it expresses the conclusions to which the committee came—I am perfectly ready to answer any question that any gentleman may ask, or to make any explanation with regard to the particular subjects contained in it. It would be almost impossible to take up that long report and undertake to make an explanation of each particular item.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator explain to us what the committee have determined to do in relation to incomes, spirituous liquors, beer, and other necessities of life? [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will explain. With regard to incomes the Senate made an amendment by which they put 5 per cent. on all incomes over $600 and not exceeding $5,000; 7½ per cent. upon the excess over $5,000 and not exceeding $15,000, and 10 per cent. over that. The committee have changed it by putting the 7½ per cent. upon all incomes over $5,000 and not exceeding $10,000, instead of $15,000. That is the change that is made there.

Mr. ANTHONY. The principle is preserved of putting the additional tax only upon the excess, and not upon the whole, as under the present law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely.

With reference to the tax upon whisky we put $1 50 on all that is manufactured after the 1st day of July and between that day and the 1st day of February next, and $2 upon all that is manufactured after the 1st day of February, 1865. That is the change made there. Instead of having three grades there are but two.

With regard to the beer tax we leave that at $1 a barrel. The Senate fixed it at $1 25. The committee put it at $1.

With regard to the tax on banks and banking that has been put into a new draft, preserving the exact relative proportions of the bill as it passed the Senate, but changing the form; one half of 1 per cent. on deposits, one half of 1 per cent. on capital, and 1 per cent. on circulation, and making provision that all the circulation over 90 per cent., or over the average of circulation for six months next preceding the 1st day of July next, shall be 2 per cent. additional. We retain also the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] exempting savings banks having no fixed capital.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator to state again what is the provision with respect to the bank tax. I did not hear it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The tax is precisely the same. The only change in it is a slight one with regard to the excess of circulation. In our bill two years ago or one year ago we had a provision diminishing the amount that could be issued by banks with a large capital. Smaller banks, banks with no more than $100,000 capital, were permitted to issue up to 90 per cent., and the rate was diminished as the capital of the bank increased. That provision was left out in this bill. It was thought by the committee that if we left it precisely as it is now, at 90 per cent., applicable to the very large banks, for instance in the city of New York, the vacuum that would be caused by the small banks withdrawing their circulation might be filled up by the larger ones. We have therefore inserted a provision putting the tax on the excess over 90 per cent. over the average of the circulation of the six months preceding the 1st day of July next. It was stated—and I suppose it is true—that the smaller banks have out a circulation largely over 90 per cent. of their capital. We did not intend that advantage should be taken of the tax in that way, and so we made that alteration. That is the way it stands or was intended to stand, and I have no doubt it is correctly drawn. It was examined by my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. VAN WINKLE,] who was a member of the committee of conference, and he says it expresses correctly the decision which the Senate came to on a former occasion on the subject.

With regard to the income tax, the five hundred and tenth amendment of the Senate was to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen," in the fifteenth line of the one hundred and fifteenth section of the bill, so as to make the clause read: "And a duty of 7½ per cent. per annum on the excess over $5,000, and not exceeding $15,000." The report of the committee of conference on that amendment is as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the five hundred and tenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert the word "ten."

So that it will read: "and not exceeding $10,000." The five hundred and eleventh amendment of the Senate was, carrying out the same idea, in line sixteen of the same section to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen," so that the clause will read: "And a duty of 10 per cent. on the excess over $15,000." The committee report on that amendment:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the five hundred and eleventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten."

That will put a tax of 10 per cent. on the excess of all incomes over $10,000.

With regard to banks, the bank section as originally drawn in the Committee of Ways and Means applied only to deposits and capital. The House of Representatives amended it by inserting a tax on circulation. We have gone over the whole ground a second time and put it into a new draft. The object was to get it into shape and we think the whole thing is now properly fixed. It is drawn in a way that will be somewhat difficult to understand by a mere reading of the report.

Mr. JOHNSON. State what it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will turn to page 175, section one hundred and nine of the bill, he will observe that the four hundred and seventeenth amendment of the Senate was to strike out "one eighth" and insert "one twenty-fourth," and the four hundred and seventy-first amendment was to strike out the words "half year" and to insert the word "month;" so as to make the section read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation, engaged in the business of banking, &c.

The report of the committee of conference on the four hundred and seventy-first amendment is as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the four hundred and seventy-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: after the word "draft," in line five, page 175, insert "or represented by certificate of deposit, or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future day," and after the word "association," in line six, insert "company."

That is a more accurate description.

Mr. JOHNSON. That leaves our amendment substantially as it stood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It merely changes it so as to make it more specific. Then the Senate recede from the four hundred and seventy-second amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why did you recede from that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because it is in another part of the bill. The four hundred and seventy-first amendment of the Senate was in line seventeen, section one hundred and nine, to strike out the word "its" before the words "capital stock," and after those words to insert "invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds;" so as to make the clause read:

And a duty of one twenty-fourth of 1 per cent. each month as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds.

The report on that amendment is as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the four hundred and seventy-fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out in lines seventeen and eighteen, page 175, "capital stock;" strike out "invested in such business," in line eighteen, and insert "the capital of any bank, association, or corporation, or person engaged in the business of banking."

Then the report proceeds, putting a number of amendments all together:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the 476th, 477th, 478th, 479th, 480th, 481st, 482d, 483d, 484th, 485th, 486th, 487th, 488th, 489th, and 490th amendments of the Senate, so far as it is proposed to strike out words, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all that is proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendments respectively, beginning with the word "and" in line nineteen, page 176, down to the word "repealed" in line one hundred and five, page 179, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And a duty of one twelfth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed, or on deposit for said bank. And an additional duty of one sixth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation issued as aforesaid beyond the amount of 90 per cent. of the capital of any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person, and upon any amount of circulation beyond the average amount of the circulation that had been issued as aforesaid by any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person for the six months preceding the 1st day of July, 1864; and on the first Monday of August next, and of each month thereafter, a true and accurate return of the amount, &c.

I suppose it is unnecessary for me to read any further of that. It goes on to provide for banks with branches. Then there is a proviso that this section shall not apply to the associations that are taxed under the other bill. It then exempts saving banks having no capital stock and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking, the same provision that was inserted in the first part of the section on the motion of the Senator from Vermont. It was intended that this should be a redraft putting it in a better shape, retaining all the substantial provisions of the original section.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will permit me to ask what is done with the four hundred and seventy-fifth amendment of the Senate on page 175 which proposes to insert the words "invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds," in the clause providing for a tax on the capital stock of the banks. Have you made that exception?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I read that.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, you did not; at least I did not hear you.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was intended to be in.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not in what you read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Here it is:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the four hundred and seventy-fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out "capital stock" in line seventeen, page 175; strike out "invested in such business" in line eighteen, page 175, and insert in lieu thereof "the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation or person engaged in the business of banking."

Then the bill goes on: "beyond the amount invested in United States bonds," &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that there?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was not struck out. We struck out the words "capital stock invested in such business," and inserted the words I have read; so that the clause will read:

And a duty of one twenty-fourth of 1 per cent. each month as aforesaid, upon the average amount of the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, or person engaged in the business of banking, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, as I understand, a long amendment proposed by the committee of conference comes in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There you stop. Then the House recede from its disagreement to all the rest of the amendments of the Senate in that section, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all that is proposed to be inserted in said Senate amendments respectively, beginning with the word "and" in line nineteen, page 176, down to the word "repealed" in line one hundred and five, page 179, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And a duty of one twelfth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, &c.

Then we go right on with the amendment that I have read. I believe it is right. It was examined very carefully by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt it is right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, with regard to the liquor tax, which will be found in section fifty-four, page 63, the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-fourth amendment of the Senate, which was to strike out "January" and insert "October," and agree to the same with an amendment to strike out "October" and insert "February;" so that it will read, "and prior to the 1st day of February."

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a previous amendment striking out "May" and inserting "June." What was done with that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. "June" was altered by the House to "July," and that alteration was concurred in by the Senate committee. That was the one hundred and sixty-third amendment. The one hundred and sixty-fourth amendment, as I have already stated, was agreed to with an amendment striking out "October" and inserting "February." The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out "4" and inserting "5," so that it will read, "February, 1865." Then the committee propose to insert after the word "dollar," in line eight of section fifty-four, the words, "and 50 cents." That will be a duty of $1 50 on all spirits from July up to February next. Then the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: before the word "on" in line nine, page 64, insert "and," and in the same line to strike out "October" and insert "February." Then the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert "4," and after the word "of" in line twelve—

Mr. JOHNSON. "Four" is what we put in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert "4," and after the word "of" in line twelve, page 64, strike out all down to and including the word "cents" in the same line, and insert in lieu thereof "42." It will then read "and on and after February 1, 1864," that cannot be right.

Mr. JOHNSON. You have got that wrong.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate will allow me, I will discontinue the making of the report and take it into the committee-room.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the order of the day.

Mr. POWELL. I will ask the consent of the Senate to take up the motion to reconsider the passage of Senate bill No. 37, and let us take the vote. Nobody wishes to speak upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill indicated by him.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate will allow us to dispose of it. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] I believe does not wish to speak further upon it, and I do not want to say a word. I merely ask that it be taken up, and that the Senate vote upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not. The Senate is not full enough at present to vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be considered at the present time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the report of the committee of conference on the tax bill passes from the attention of the Senate, I desire to move that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has already passed from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It ought to be printed, because it will then take less time when we come to consider it.

Mr. FESSENDEN subsequently said: I am now prepared to continue with the consideration of the report of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be proceeded with unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out "October" and insert "February." The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: strike out "4" and insert "5," and after "dollar," in line eight, section fifty-four, insert "and 50 cents." The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: before "on," in line nine, page 64, to insert "and," and strike out "October" and insert "February."

Mr. JOHNSON. The difficulty was in the one hundred and sixty-seventh amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know it; but that is right so far. The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert "5," and after the word "of," in line twelve, page 64, strike out all down to the word "cents" in the same line, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof "42." The House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the amendment with the following amendment: strike out all of said Senate amendment, and also the words "which duty," in line nineteen, page 64, and insert in lieu thereof, "and all spirits which may be in the possession of the distiller or in public store or bonded warehouse, on either the 1st day of July or February aforesaid, no duty having been paid thereon, shall be held and treated as if distilled on those days respectively, and said duties." That is the report of the committee in regard to the liquor tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. The effect, then, I believe, is to impose a tax of $1 50 after the 1st of July, and $2 after the 1st of February, 1865.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; and we have inserted a provision retaining the same duties that now exist until this act goes into effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the increased duty apply to goods in warehouse, on the 1st of July next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It applies to all that may be in the possession of the distiller, or in bonded warehouse, or removed, where the duties have not been paid. If there is any other matter which any Senator wishes me to explain I am ready to do so. If not, I move that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the Senate (No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 527) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SUMNER to add the following as an additional section:

And he it further enacted, That sections eight and nine of the act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," which sections undertake to regulate the coastwise slave trade, are hereby repealed, and the coastwise slave trade prohibited forever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I base my opposition to this amendment simply on the ground I stated last night, and which I will not repeat. I hope the Senate will keep legislative matter off this appropriation bill. If I am overruled in that I shall submit with deference to the Senate. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe I had the floor last evening on this amendment. The condition of my health is such, and particularly my powers of utterance are so affected at this time, that I cannot make any elaborate reply to the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON], but I desire to say a very few words which are called for by the present aspect of this amendment. My attention at first was called merely to the repeal of the two sections mentioned in the proposition. My attention was not then called to the latter proposition which is now inserted in the proposed amendment to prohibit the coastwise slave trade. My attention was first called to it by the honorable Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I shall content myself simply with reading the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, reported in 15 Peters. In that case the State of Mississippi had inserted in its constitution a provision that slaves should not be brought into that State for sale. Some slaves were brought in and sold and a note was taken up and sued in the circuit court. The defense was that the note was unlawfully made. Various points arose in the case, and among others this one: whether that was an attempt on the part of the State to regulate commerce between the States, and if so whether it was an encroachment upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States; because the power to regulate commerce between the States does not exist in the alternative, with the States or with the General Government, as each may choose to exercise it; but it is an exclusive grant of power to Congress. In considering that point, Judge McLean says:

"In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheat., 185,) this court decided that the power to regulate commerce is exclusively vested in Congress, and that no part of it can be exercised by a State.

"The necessity of a uniform commercial regulation, more than any other consideration, led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. And, unless the power be not only paramount but exclusive, the Constitution must fail to attain one of the principal objects of its formation.

"It has been contended that a State may exercise a commercial power if the same has not been exercised by Congress; and that this power of the State ceased when the Federal authority was exerted over the same subject-matter."

He goes on to repudiate that, and says:

"Can the transfer and sale of slaves from one State to another be regulated by Congress under the commercial power?"

I ask gentlemen to pay attention to this.

"If a State may admit or prohibit slaves at its discretion, this power must be in the State and not in Congress. The Constitution seems to recognize the power to be in the States. The importation of certain persons, meaning slaves, which was not to be prohibited before 1808, was limited to such States, then existing, as shall think proper to admit them. Some of the States at that time prohibited the admission of slaves, and their right to do so was as strongly implied by this provision as the right of other States that admitted them.

"The Constitution treats slaves as persons. In the second section of the first article, which apportions Representatives and direct taxes among the States, it provides, 'The numbers shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons.' And again, in the third section of the fourth article, it is declared that 'no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.'

"By the laws of certain States slaves are treated as property; and the constitution of Mississippi prohibits their being brought into that State by citizens of other States for sale, or as merchandise. Merchandise is a comprehensive term, and may include every article of traffic whether foreign or domestic which is properly embraced by a commercial regulation. But if slaves are considered in some of the States as merchandise, that cannot divest them of the leading and controlling quality of persons by which they are designated in the Constitution."

"The constitution of Ohio declares that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in that State except for the punishment of crimes. Is this provision in conflict with the power in Congress to regulate commerce? It goes much further than the constitution of Mississippi. That prohibits only the introduction of slaves into the State by the citizens of other States as merchandise; but the constitution of Ohio not only does this, but it declares that slavery shall not exist in the State. Does not the greater power include the lesser? If Ohio may prohibit the introduction of slaves into it altogether, may not the State of Mississippi regulate their admission?"

After arguing this at some length he comes to this conclusion:

"The power over slavery belongs to the States respectively. It is local in its character and in its effects; and the transfer or sale of slaves cannot be separated from this power. It is, indeed, an essential part of it.

"Each State has a right to protect itself against the avarice and intrusion of the slave dealer; to guard its citizens against the inconveniences and dangers of a slave population.

"The right to exercise this power by a State is higher and deeper than the Constitution. The evil involves the prosperity and may endanger the existence of a State. Its power to guard against or to remedy the evil rests upon the law of self-preservation, a law vital to every community, and especially to a sovereign State."

Chief Justice Taney on this same point said:

"In my judgment, the power over this subject is exclusively with the several States; and each of them has a right to decide for itself whether it will or will not allow persons of this description to be brought within its limits from another State, either for sale or for any other purpose; and also to prescribe the manner and mode in which they may be introduced, and to determine their condition and treatment within their respective territories; and the action of the several States upon this subject cannot be controlled by Congress, either by virtue of its power to regulate commerce or by virtue of any other power conferred by the Constitution of the United States."

Now, Mr. President, I consider that that case has decided that this subject of the introduction or passage of slaves from one State to another is entirely within the power of the several States; that it does not fall within the power given to Congress to regulate commerce between the States; and for the main reason which I have given before. It was essentially for this: that if we can prohibit it we can allow it, and if we can allow it we can defeat the purpose of the State altogether. The great point in the case is that they are, as Judge McLean says, persons, not property, not articles of commerce and trade, and therefore do not fall within this delegated power that is given to Congress. I say, therefore, that the sections of the law of 1807 which it is proposed to repeal ought to be repealed, because they attempt to regulate it. I must say further, I consider any attempt by Congress to prohibit, or allow, or regulate this subject is to treat these persons as property, articles of merchandise, and to endeavor to exercise the power of Congress under that delegation of power to regulate commerce as covering it contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court. This last clause which the honorable Senator had added to his amendment prohibiting the coastwise slave trade is an attempt to exercise this power, and I therefore shall be obliged to vote against the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to make one remark as to the question of power. I say nothing as to whether Congress under the Constitution may undertake to regulate the trade in slaves between the States on the land. I waive that question. The proposition before the Senate simply undertakes to prohibit the coastwise slave trade. Now, sir, I hold in my hand Brightley's Digest. By turning to that you will find there is one head entitled "coasting trade," containing no less than forty-eight different sections, each section being in the nature of a regulation by Congress on that subject. I turn, then, to another head entitled "passengers." There I find seventeen sections, each section being in the nature of a regulation on that subject; and in point of fact it is well known to the Senate that Congress has, by most minute regulations, determined the conditions on which passengers shall be carried in ships. It is known that those regulations are applied especially on board the California steamers, and also the steamers between this country and Europe. In the one case the steamers are foreign; in the other they are domestic; or the trade, if I may so say, is domestic. In view of this minute and ample legislation of Congress on the subject of passengers and of the coasting trade, I submit there can be no question that Congress can go further, and by a final regulation declare that in that coasting trade there shall be no such thing as the slave trade.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cardie, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Neshmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Salsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am requested to move a couple of amendments from the Committee on the Library. At the end of the first section we move to insert the following:

To enable the Joint Library Committee to purchase a collection of early American maps and plans, chiefly manuscript originals, illustrative of the French war and the war of the Revolution, for deposit in the Library of Congress, $4,000.

Mr. President, this is a small matter, but it is a matter of great interest to any gentleman having any historical curiosity. Here are about one hundred plans and maps, which were obtained a few years since from the royal geographer of England. A large part of them are original drafts, illustrative of the Braddock expedition, of the French war, our revolutionary war, and of the early periods of our history. They are works of very great interest and curiosity. They were original drafts put into the hands of the royal geographer from which some plates were made, the originals remaining in his hands. They were sold some few years since, and a gentleman in Boston obtained this selection of plans and drafts made by British officers. For instance, here are seven plans showing the progress of the Braddock expedition in 1756, from stage to stage, as it went on, and plans of the different parts of the country as he passed through. Here are the plans of the expedition to Lewisburg. Here are a set of plans of the attack and defense and the whole proceedings of the Bunker Hill fight, and Boston and vicinity. Here are the plans for the attack on Charleston, in the Revolution, drawn by British officers of the topographical engineers. Here are the operations of Sir William Howe, and his plan for the attack on West Point, in 1777. Here are the original plans, made by officers at the time, of all the operations before Yorktown, and the progress of the siege. Here is the original plan of the attack upon Quebec under Wolfe, and of all that region of country. There are one hundred of them, all of great public interest, which we can make a purchase of at the present time. I have no doubt the gentleman now possessing them could sell them at once to our historical societies for a great deal more money. Little as there may be in these drafts and plans, poor as I am, I would give $100 to see them. We desire to secure these original maps and plans for the Library.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can they be got for the sum indicated in the amendment?

Mr. COLLAMER. They can be got for $1,000, and we desire to make a portfolio of them for the use of the Library, and we ask for this appropriation for that purpose:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have one other amendment to offer:

To pay Henry R. Schoolcraft for one hundred copies of two additional volumes to complete his work entitled, Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, to be paid under the direction of the Joint Library Committee whenever he shall deliver to them the said number of copies, printed and bound in as good style as the volumes already published under authority of Congress, to be done within three years, $10,000.

Mr. Schoolcraft was employed in making this great national work. It took him a number of years to collect the material and to publish it; and appropriations were made for it from time to time until the present volumes were completed. He had gathered the elements and materials for two other volumes to complete the work. He is now in that condition that he is incapable of moving about; he has lost pretty much the power of locomotion; but possesses all the powers of his mind fully, and writes by an amanuensis. Out of the material which he has collected, he has prepared these two additional volumes to complete the work. He wants aid now to publish them, and the committee, after full consideration, recommend that there be paid to him $10,000 if he will deliver one hundred copies of each of those two volumes when completed if he completes them in the same style as the former volumes.

Mr. HALE. I will ask the Senator who has reported this bill if the attention of the committee was called to a conflict about the title to the maps and plates that were made by Major Eastman and Schoolcraft.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. There is a contest about them.

Mr. COLLAMER. Some three or four years ago, I believe, at the application of Mr. Schoolcraft, Congress passed an act delivering over those plates, which had been executed by the Government in making out these volumes, to Mrs. Schoolcraft for him, with authority to use the copyright of those volumes.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir. I do not remember now precisely what the character of it was. It is possible you may, Mr. President. I do not know how that is, and it has been out of my mind ever since; but at that time I know Major Eastman complained that he had been very unfairly and harshly dealt by, and that he was very materially injured by the resolution that was passed by Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir, it has a good deal to do with it. The very plates used in the six volumes that have been published—

Mr. COLLAMER. This is for two additional volumes and has nothing to do with them. They are a continuation of the work on the Indians of America. Every one has seen the work. These two additional volumes will complete the work. Those plates to which the Senator refers related to the six volumes that the Government has already published. This amendment is in relation to two additional volumes and has nothing to do with those plates.

Mr. HALE. I am satisfied that we have done great injustice to Major Eastman, who was a meritorious artist, who made those plans. He expected to use them for his own benefit, but afterwards, by act of Congress, they were all transferred to Schoolcraft, when in fact the great merit, if there was any merit in them, belonged to Major Eastman. The major felt deeply wronged by the action of the Government in that transfer of the plates to Schoolcraft.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know how. I never heard before of any contest between the officer spoken of and Mr. Schoolcraft. Congress in 1857 or 1858, I forget which, when I suppose the contest alluded to was before Congress, passed an act giving all the plates to Mr. Schoolcraft. As has just been stated by the chairman, the two volumes which the Committee on the Library propose now to provide for are volumes in which there are no maps or plates of any description, and of course, therefore, so far as they are concerned, the whole claim upon the Government, if there is any claim upon the Government, is the claim of Mr. Schoolcraft.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember something about this resolution in the House of Representatives. It is Mrs. Schoolcraft that we are dealing with, not Mr. Schoolcraft. He is unable to be about. I have seen him often. Mrs. Schoolcraft complained that the plates and maps accompanying the manuscript and papers of her husband were not published by Congress, and that there were two volumes that Congress refused to publish. The work was to be completed with the sixth volume. Thereupon a resolution was introduced for her benefit, and she was given the plates and property of the United States, consisting of all the engravings, drawings, and diagrams, estimated to be worth from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars, in distinct satisfaction of all claim that she asserted against the United States for the failure to publish all the manuscript that had been collected together by her husband. That resolution was understood by both Houses, at least by the House of Representatives, and the debates will show it, as an entire relinquishment and disconnection of the United States with the publication of Schoolcraft's History of the Indians. There is no doubt about these facts.

Now it is proposed in this time of trouble and difficulty to appropriate $10,000 for two hundred additional volumes, or fifty dollars a volume, of this work. We have got the cream of them all published in six volumes that have already been printed. We have surrendered over to Mrs. Schoolcraft not only the property of the United States, but have delivered to her the property of Major Eastman. I remember that claim very well. Major Eastman had just as much right to a portion of those plates as Mrs. Schoolcraft, but we gave the whole of them to Mrs. Schoolcraft. Under these circumstances, without further debate, I am not disposed to publish these two volumes, and especially at such an enormous expense as fifty dollars a volume.

Mr. GRIMES. I should really like to know how old this Mr. Schoolcraft is before I am called upon to vote on this amendment, because I should like to know what the probability is of the duration of this continual annuity being paid to him, or something approaching an annuity, in the shape of appropriations of this description.

Mr. SHERMAN. We settled with him once, and got a full quitance, as we supposed, with the Schoolcraft Indians.

Mr. COLLAMER. This is not put on the ground of a claim, but to finish the work.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the yeas and nays on this proposition. I shall vote for no new books.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is not a claim, as the honorable Senator from Iowa seems to suppose.

Mr. GRIMES. I know it is not a claim.

Mr. JOHNSON. Because whatever has been done before has been settled for by the Government; but there is now in the possession of this gentleman, and which must have been the result of materials collected before, what will constitute two volumes. The Committee on the Library believe it will be very beneficial to the country to have them printed. There is no mode of getting the history of the Indians complete other than the one which the committee provide. It is not, therefore, upon the ground that there is any claim, direct or indirect, on the part of Mr. Schoolcraft, or anybody else, for $10,000, but upon the ground that under all the circumstances it is advisable that we have the work.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not understand that anybody had put this in the shape of a claim upon Congress, except a claim upon the gratitude and the benevolence of Congress. It was said that this gentleman was a very infirm man, and that statement, I suppose, was made in the way of inducement to cause us to continue this business of publishing books, or assist in the publication of these books, upon the ground that they are to be a history of the Indians.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member does injustice to the Library Committee, and particularly to my friend the chairman of that committee. He has not mentioned, nor have the Library Committee considered it at all as a reason why we should buy these books, that Mr. Schoolcraft was bedridden. He happened to say that he had not seen Mr. Schoolcraft because he was bedridden from paralysis, and had been bedridden for some time, but his mind, always of the highest order before he was paralyzed, remains, as we understand, just as powerful now as it ever was. He can use an amanuensis, not for the purpose of preparing the work in any other way than an amanuensis can be said to prepare anything written by a master mind. The only question with the committee was, not a question of gratitude, not a question of sympathy, not a question of benevolence, but whether the work itself was one which the Government ought to have, and we came to that conclusion, believing, as the committee or the majority of the Joint Committee on the Library did, that it was advisable that the Government should get this work if it could be obtained for $10,000, and they are not to pay a dime until it is printed and it turns out that in point of fact these two volumes are prepared in the same way and in the same style with the volumes for which we have already paid.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. Schoolcraft asked for a considerably larger amount and proposed to deliver more volumes, but we did not think it necessary in order to secure the work that we should buy any more than the number indicated in the amendment. We thought that would be sufficient to insure the publication.

Mr. GRIMES. Does this finish the work, or are we not to continue this work or assist in the publication, so long as this man may live?

Mr. JOHNSON. This finishes it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We finished it once before.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the reason why I wanted to know the age of this man, because I wanted to know how long it was probable on a computation of the duration of his existence we might be called upon in this same way by the Committee on the Library to finish the work by an additional appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Schoolcraft is certainly, I think, not a very old man, and if he had good health he might do something in the future. I understand that he is broken down by paralysis and confined to his room, but his intellect is as clear as ever, and he has been able to prepare these volumes with assistance in regard to labor. That is what I understand to be the fact, and that this is the completion of what he intended to do; I, therefore, shall vote for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire how much a volume it is proposed to pay?

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifty dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Fifty dollars a volume?

Mr. COLLAMER. The idea was this: that he was to receive this contribution to enable him to complete the work.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say one word in reference to Mr. Schoolcraft, the author of this great work upon Indian antiquities. He has spent a very large portion of his life in the neighborhood of Indians, and indeed with Indians, in the examination of their antiquities, their language, and their manners and customs, and it is probable that there is no living man who in these respects can at all compare with Mr. Schoolcraft. Although, if it were a new question whether to afford a subsidy to him or anybody else for the purpose of preserving these curious records, I might be disposed to vote against it and probably should be disposed to vote against it, still, as we have got, as the saying is, our foot in it, I do not see but we must face it until we come to the end. Without these volumes, if I understand it, the work will be left in a very imperfect state.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Michigan will allow me, the last volume published is a very valuable and interesting one, a general résumé of the whole work, and is really a completion of it, and a very proper completion. The whole work is bound and completed at the end of the sixth volume, which is a general résumé of the whole history, character, and language of the Indians, and that was intended to be the end of the work so far as Congress was concerned. Then Congress gave over to Mrs. Schoolcraft—for it was Mrs. Schoolcraft that was negotiating with Congress—all the materials belonging to the Government, the maps, plates, engravings, &c., because the work was supposed to be completed.

Mr. HOWARD. I will inquire of my friend from Ohio whether this subject has not been referred to a committee, and been reported upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. The majority of the Committee on the Library have agreed upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly it may be true, as the Senator from Ohio remarks, that it was supposed when he had come to the end of the sixth volume he had finished his labors; but he discovered his mistake, and he only verified the truth of what Byron says—

Mr. COLLAMER. If the Senator will allow me, Dr. Schoolcraft never said that the work was completed at any time. He had not finished the materials which he had collected by order of the Government; but Congress then stopped the work.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know what may have been the opinion of Mr. Schoolcraft. At all events, authors are apt to verify the lines of Byron that there is nothing so difficult as a beginning in poetry unless perhaps the end. That is probably true in this case, and it is by no means certain that the work will be brought to a close even by this appropriation; but, as I remarked before, as we have purchased the others, let us dispose of him as well as we can. I think I shall vote for this appropriation.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Michigan has anticipated very much what I proposed to say. I rose at the same time he did. If this were a new question I should not see my way to vote for the appropriation; but we have already begun and gone far with this work. It has become almost a national monument. Perhaps no publication of our country has been regarded with more interest by the scientific world abroad than these volumes relating to the North American Indians. Mr. Schoolcraft was recognized everywhere as a master of all the knowledge relating to the aborigines of our country. He is now in a sad condition, but he has accumulated materials which, I understand, with assistance he will be able to compile. As we have begun the publication of this work I am disposed not to stop until it is finished, although if the question were now whether we should begin I should not see my way clear in voting for it.

Mr. HARLAN. When the Government of the United States appoints an officer to make a survey or exploration there is an official reason for publishing his report at the expense of the Government. Having been appointed to investigate any particular subject, scientific or otherwise, the object of the appointment cannot be fully realized without the publication of the result of his researches, and hence Congress has from time to time made appropriations to pay for books of this character, purely scientific in their nature, and not directly connected with the ordinary machinery of Government; but that had grown to be a terrible abuse, and a few years ago there was an effort made to discontinue publications of that kind. To illustrate: when Congress originally ordered the publication of the report of the Pacific railroad surveys, I suppose no one contemplated that it would consist of more than one quarto volume of five or six hundred pages, and yet we now have twelve quarto volumes, enormous books, on that subject, and I think the publication is not ended yet. We ordered the publication of the Stevens report. I think it was stated when the publication was ordered that it would constitute one additional volume of the usual size. One volume was printed; then they have printed part one and part two and part three of the usual size, and whether the work has been completed or not I apprehend no member of the Senate knows. Whether part four will not be found on our desks at the next session of Congress, printed, bound, and embellished, is a question that I am not prepared to decide, and I apprehend nobody is. When you once order a work it seems to be impossible to get to the end of it.

Now, to come to the question more directly before the Senate, Congress originally ordered the publication of certain papers collected by Mr. Schoolcraft connected with the history, manners, and habits of the Indian tribes in North America. The work was sent to the printer, and one enormous volume was published, then another and another and another, from year to year, until six vast volumes were completed. It was then understood that the whole work was at last ended, and, as has been stated here to-day, the plates and lithographs, and everything of that kind that had been connected with the publication, although Government property, were donated to the author. It was in the beginning a purely private enterprise, of no possible consequence to the Government or any one of its officers. But since the Government decided to end its connection with this work it seems that these parties profess to have collected other papers and additional information on that subject of Indians, and this provision proposes an additional appropriation to pay for their publication. Why so? If the proposed work is valuable, why can it not be published by a book publisher? It certainly would sell in the market if the information be desirable. If the information is not desirable the work would not sell, and it would not be profitable to a private publisher, and hence the necessity of coming to Congress for a subsidy. No author would dream of coming to Congress for a subsidy to him to publish a work that he expected would attract the attention of intelligent readers, because the profits in that case would probably be enormous to the publisher.

But the reason for the proposed appropriation in this case seems to consist in the fact that the authors themselves are unable to find a private publisher with whom they can make a contract to publish their work. The private publishers, looking at the character of the collections or compilations, believe that it will not be of sufficient interest to justify the publication. Hence they come to Congress, and the Library Committee propose to saddle the expense on the nation. If it were the report of an officer of this Government detailed to make an investigation, to explore the country, or to collect information under the laws of the United States, he would be unable to procure a copyright, and hence would hardly be able to interest the trade sufficiently to secure the publication, however important or popular; hence the necessity, it seems to me, for publishing it at the public expense to realize the object of the Government in making the appointment; but in this case we have never authorized the collection of these additional papers, and clearly intimated to the parties that all connection of the Government with the enterprise was ended and the whole thing concluded; but these parties, prompted by private interest, have collected other papers; and finding no publisher willing to risk the success of the new books in the market to defray expenses, the authors have been hanging around Congress here for two or three years to obtain the aid of the Government. This is not a new thing. The parties in interest have been hanging around this body lobbying to secure the sympathy and votes of members for several years in order to get a subsidy to enable them to publish a work that they believe will not command sufficient interest in the country with the reading public to justify a private publisher in printing the work. If we take up works of this kind and print them at the public expense I cannot see any end to it. If Mr. Schoolcraft needs help, and the Government is under any obligations to support him, give him a pension at once and avoid the hypocrisy of ordering the publication of new books for the use of the Library which nobody wants and which consequently nobody will publish, when the real object is to grant assistance to an indigent old man whose friends importune for aid on the ground of charity.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I hope that at this time there will be no $10,000 or $1,000 appropriated for any such purpose. I think that the necessities of this people and of this Government are sufficiently tried in the expenditure of money without appropriating it to such a purpose as can do nobody any good at this time certainly. I cannot see that the Government or people of this country are to be benefited by the appropriation.

There is another point about it. I am told by Senators that the persons who are to receive this money are not altogether loyal. That would be a sufficient reason with me to vote against the appropriation at this time. The fact that they are not loyal, that the appropriation is not necessary to carry on the war, and that the people of the country will not be benefited by it, are to me sufficient reasons why the appropriation should not be made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I presume that if these persons, about whom I know nothing either personally or by reputation, are not loyal, there is some evidence accessible to Congress to prove that fact. Perhaps there is some judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction that has tried that question and ascertained that they are not loyal. If such a record exists anywhere, perhaps it would be proper to produce it. I know of no way of determining the loyalty of persons except that mode which the law points out. That is by judicial process, by a judgment of a court having competent jurisdiction, where the charge is made in a legal form and determined on legal principles; but if any individual's private judgment is to be the standard of loyalty of everybody else, I think it is a very unsatisfactory mode of determining it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I presume there are many ways of testing the loyalty of people, and I presume that in this case loyalty might have been tested in a way that I would have tested a case yesterday. Yesterday in riding in the cars of the horse railroad from this Capitol to the Treasury Department, an incident occurred which may perhaps be a sufficient illustration as to the test of loyalty. A rebel prisoner under charge of a sentry stepped into the car. He was very dirty and very wild and very haggard; he evidently put on as desperate a look as it was possible for a man to put on. His countenance, his whole appearance was daring, belligerent. He created some attention but no one spoke until finally a well-dressed man stepped in from the street and sat opposite this prisoner. He looked at him for a moment or two, and just before I found myself at my destination he asked the sentry a question which I did not hear. He then asked the prisoner "From what regiment are you?" The reply was, "I am from the second." "Second what?" "The second Virginia cavalry." "Have you any money?" "I have ten dollars in Confederate money." "Have you any greenbacks?" "I have one dollar." "Do you want some money?" "Yes." He took out his pocket-book and tendered the man ten dollars. He handed it in a way to attract the attention of every person in that car, and his manner was defiant. He was a citizen of this town, receiving its protection.

I presume that no Senator will think that I was not justified in believing that the man who gave money to that prisoner in that way sympathized with the rebellion, and I presume that Senators who have spoken to the lady that is to receive this money, when they have tested her by her conversation, find that the impressions left on their minds are that she is not loyal, and they certainly have a right to believe that without an investigation of the matter in a court of law.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harding, Henderson, McDougall, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract on behalf of the United States for the printing and publishing of the unpublished Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States delivered since the 4th of March, 1837, on the terms following, namely: the said Opinions to be published in as many volumes as may be necessary, which shall be, as to the quality, the paper, printing, and binding, of uniform style and appearance with the eighth volume of said Opinions, published by Robert Farnham in the year 1838, and as nearly as possible of uniform size with said eighth volume, and which shall be numbered in regular order after the said eighth volume, the copyright thereof to be taken out by and to be for the use of the publisher, who shall deliver to the Attorney General for the use of the United States, within one month after the publication thereof, three hundred sets of said volumes at the price of four dollars per volume, payable after they are so delivered. And the Attorney General is hereby authorized to employ a competent person to edit and prepare the said Opinions for publication as aforesaid, with proper head notes and indexes, and to supervise the said publication. When the said three hundred sets shall have been delivered for the use of the United States, the Attorney General shall cause them to be distributed as follows: for the President of the United States, two sets; for the Department of State, ten sets; for the Department of the Treasury and the heads of bureaus thereof, twenty-five sets; for the Department of War and the heads of bureaus thereof, twenty-five sets; for the Department of the Navy and the heads of bureaus thereof, fifteen sets; for the Department of the Interior and the heads of bureaus thereof, twenty sets; for the Department of the Post Office, ten sets; for the Attorney General's Office, ten sets; for the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, one set each, and the library of said court three sets; for the judges of the Court of Claims, the solicitor, and assistant and deputy solicitor of said court, one set each; for the Library of Congress, fifty sets for the use of both Houses of Congress; the residue of said three hundred sets to remain at the future disposal of Congress. And the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the editing of the said Opinions and the price of the said three hundred sets, which money shall be disbursed on vouchers approved by the Attorney General.

This is a provision, carefully guarded I think, to bring up the Opinions of the Attorneys General, which have not been published since 1857. It is supposed they will make about four volumes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose this amendment as a new section to come in after the fourth section of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to appoint a book-keeper for the national armory at Springfield, whose compensation shall be $1,200 per annum; and the compensation of the clerks at said armory shall be $1,000 per annum each.

We now pay $800 to the chief book-keeper at the Springfield armory and to the clerks employed there. The business there has increased immensely, as we all know. Mr. Dyer, who is the superintendent, recommends an increase of these salaries, and says he cannot get along well without it. General Ramsay, of the ordnance department, strongly recommends it, and so does the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Watson. In fact they recommended $1,400 for the chief book-keeper and $1,200 for the clerks, but the Committee on Military Affairs have fixed the chief book-keeper at $1,200 and the clerks at $1,000, making an increase of $400 to Mr. Winchester, who has had the care of the books of the armory for many years, and of $200 each to the clerks. There is an immense number of men employed at the armory; the business done at the institution is very great, and I think this small increase of pay is justly due to these officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am opposed to this class of amendments, not because I have any information that will enable me to say that the salaries proposed are too high, but simply because I desire to keep this bill free from extraneous matter. There is no appropriation in this bill for the armory at Springfield; there is nothing whatever in the bill in relation to the armory at Springfield or to carrying on the war, and if we commence receiving propositions to raise salaries as amendments to this bill, I do not know where we shall end. Let the Senator attach the amendment to some military bill; he has those bills under his charge. It has no connection with this appropriation bill, and I must therefore oppose it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to engage in a contest that may lead to a judgment against this proposition, which is so just in itself, by trying to force it upon this bill. I made the proposition because I thought it would be as well to put it on this bill. It is a small thing, any way, though to the persons concerned it is a large matter. I will withdraw it now and offer it on some military bill before the end of the session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not contest the merits of it, but I wish to keep this bill free from extraneous matter.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment, because I will not run the risk of getting a judgment of the Senate against it by insisting upon it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer this amendment, to come in at the end of the second section of the bill:

For plans and detailed drawings for proposed changes in the Capitol wings to secure improvements in the ventilation, heating, and acoustics of the Halls of Congress, the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary; the said outlay to be authorized and approved by the joint select committee of the two Houses upon the ventilation, &c., of the said Halls, and to be paid out of the aforesaid appropriation for the Capitol extension.

I am authorized by the committee to offer the amendment. I presume it explains itself. It is not necessary to make a speech in its favor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am authorized by the Committee on Commerce to offer an amendment, to come in after line one hundred and one of section one:

For construction and repair of light-boats, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $150,000.

I will state to the Senator from Ohio that this item has been received from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives; the estimate was received by that committee too late to insert it in this bill; if it had been received in time it would have been placed there by the other House. It is an appropriation, not to construct anything new particularly, but to preserve the light-boats and keep them in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I understand that it is reported from the Senate Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Yes, sir; and it was received from the House Committee on Commerce with a request that it should be put upon this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have a communication on the subject from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Light-House Board which can be read if desired.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I rise to move the reduction of a very small appropriation, but it seems to be more than is needed. In line fifty-five of section two there is an appropriation of $500 for repairs to the bridge across the Potomac river at Little Falls. I move to strike out $500 and insert $250; and I will state that some weeks ago I received a communication from the mayor of Georgetown, calling my attention and desiring me to call the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the necessity of a small appropriation for the repair of this bridge. In his letter he says this:

"The bridge at the Little Falls of the Potomac, about three miles from this place, and which was erected by Congress, has been so much used by Army trains and other vehicles during the last three years as to very much wear out the flooring, and is in great need of early repairs. I have had its condition carefully examined by an experienced mechanic, who thinks that the sum of $250 would be adequate to the cost of the work and materials which would be required to put it in proper order."

I move, therefore, to amend the bill by reducing this appropriation from $500 to $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to insert after line one hundred and sixty of section two, where there is an appropriation for surveying the public lands in Kansas and Nebraska, the following clause:

And the consent of Congress is given to the construction, under the authority of the State of Kansas, of a toll-bridge across the Republican river, near Fort Riley, with the perpetual use of the land necessary for said bridge and toll-houses, and with the further privilege to take stone and timber for the construction of said bridge from the fort's reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that a provision for a toll-bridge in Kansas should come before us in a well-considered proposition from the Military Committee, or the Committee on Public Lands. Every Senator can see the effect of such legislation on the appropriation bills.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Last night I asked that the Government should appropriate $10,000 for the construction of a free bridge on the Government fort reserve. It was decided that the citizens of the State of Kansas should erect the bridge. We are not in the habit ourselves of making free bridges; but I think we can erect a toll-bridge. Our tolls are low; they will be regulated by the State. If we are to build bridges for the Government, I propose that we shall build them on the same terms that we build other bridges.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no regulation here by the State. They can charge what they please.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But a company has to be chartered for the purpose by the Legislature, and the Legislature will fix the tolls.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the foreman of the Government bindery hereafter be $1,800 per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same objection applies to this as to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I hope all propositions to increase salaries will be kept off this bill. The same arguments could be urged in favor of increasing the salaries of other employees as the employee named by the Senator from Rhode Island. This bill makes no appropriation for printing; it is confined to appropriations for the light-house system, surveying the public lands, and miscellaneous expenses; it has no connection with the legislative or executive departments or the printing office.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will just state the case and submit it to the judgment of the Senate. The foreman of the composing room at the Government printing office receives $1,800 a year, while the foreman of the bindery receives but $1,500 a year. There is no reason why they should not both have the same sum. The Superintendent of Public Printing recommends that the increase be made, and I submit it to the Senate at his suggestion. I believe it is only a fair price for the skill and ability required in this place, and I think the same price may be obtained elsewhere.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. The third section of this bill appropriates $100,000 in order to aid the administration of justice, especially in order to bring to conviction persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, or other securities of the United States, as well as the coin of the United States. In order to accomplish that result something more than an appropriation of money is needed; an amendment of the law of evidence is necessary; and I send to the Chair an amendment by way of proviso to the third section.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to the third section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

Mr. SUMNER. There is an amendment which surely is germane. The objection of form, urged by the Senator from Ohio, to my other proposition is without any shadow of support here. It is proposed in the bill to appropriate $100,000 to "bring to trial and punishment" counterfeiters. The object is important, especially at this moment when we are putting in circulation national securities on so large a scale. But suppose that the counterfeiter, in a State where the testimony of colored persons is excluded, chooses to employ such persons to aid him. How can you bring him to punishment? All this large appropriation will not help in such a case. It will be of no avail. The counterfeiter surrounded by his colored accomplices may mock your laws. But admit the testimony of these accomplices, and then will justice be done. I refer to this class of cases because your bill provides especially for them, and thus testifies to the importance of precautionary effort.

But the hardship and absurdity of this rule, apparent in the case of a counterfeiter surrounded by colored accomplices, will arise in every other case of crime. How justice can be administered where such a rule prevails, I am at a loss to understand. Now that slavery is disappearing, this rule ought to disappear also.

This subject has already been discussed at length during the present session in an elaborate report which I have had the honor of making from the select committee on slavery and freedmen, so that I need not occupy your time. Besides, the case is too plain for argument. But I have in my hands letters from gentlemen in Virginia, showing the practical necessity of admitting the testimony of colored persons there. Here is one:

HALL OF THE CONVENTION,
ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, March 17, 1864.

I address thee as friend, although having no personal acquaintance, but have long known thee by reputation as a friend to the human race. Having been connected with the reorganized government from its beginning, naturally feel a strong interest in its welfare.

We have in convention abolished slavery in the organic law of the State, and it would at first sight seem as if our fondest hopes were realized. But another difficulty now stares us in the face, which, in the present state of public opinion, we cannot conquer. I allude to the subject of allowing the freedmen to give testimony in our courts. This will not be allowed where the interests of whites are involved. The result that will follow any one can foresee, that their persons and property will be at the mercy of every vagabond who may happen to have a black heart instead of a black skin.

While they were slaves their masters were a protection to them against others; although there was not much law looking that way, their owners being of the all-powerful class in the communities in which they lived; their influence answered the end very well. My object in writing was to make them acquainted with the probable future position of these people, thinking it might be possible to ameliorate their condition by some Federal legislation. While I speak of Virginia I have no doubt but that the same will be true of the whole South, and will be a gigantic evil that may lead to the most disastrous results. The negro after this war will not be the same man as before: breathing the air of freedom, trained to arms, understanding the power of combination, and familiar with blood, it will be tampering with a volcano to deny him protection of person and property.

Please consider this as private as far as my name is concerned.

I do not give the name of this writer, because he is unwilling that it should be known. But you will observe, from the date of the letter, that he was a member of the Virginia convention. His testimony will speak for itself. The other letter, as you will see, is from the district judge of Virginia:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT.
ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, March 22, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Some time since I saw by the papers that you were urging the admission of our freedmen as witnesses in all United States courts.

In several confiscation cases now pending in this court, such testimony will be of the greatest importance. Indeed, I am told by the United States assistant attorney in this court that from his knowledge in the preparation of these cases, the prosecution will probably fail and the Government be subjected to costs unless such testimony is allowed in several cases now on our docket. You will therefore see the necessity of a speedy change of the law corresponding to the change which has taken place in the condition of the freedmen.

Your obedient servant,

JOHN C. UNDERWOOD,
District Judge.

HON. CHARLES SUMNER, United States Senator.

This is practical testimony. Let me add to it words from another. Sir Samuel Romilly, whose great fame as a lawyer was enhanced by humane labors in Parliament, has furnished his testimony on this very point:

"The laws of the colonies are said to be humane; but by those laws a child of five or six years old may receive for a slight offense or for no offense at all, at the caprice of the master or overseer, no less than thirty-nine lashes with what is termed a cat-whip. To this degrading extent the law authorized the infliction of punishment by individuals. But even in cases where the law conveys no authority, where wanton cruelty is inflicted in defiance of the law, how easy it must be to escape detection, when the testimony of a negro, or a thousand negroes, would not avail against a white man! And with what force must this argument strike when we reflect on the proportion which the white bear to the black inhabitants of the island. What security could we expect in our passage even through the streets of London if ninety-nine people out of a hundred, or even nine out of ten, were incompetent to give evidence in a court of justice?"—Speeches of Romilly, vol. 1, p. 25.

Mr. President, in presenting this measure, I waive for the present all questions of right, and, if you please, all sentiments of humanity. I ask attention plainly and directly to the practical failure of justice which must arise without its adoption. Those may be seen under two different heads: first, with regard to colored persons; and secondly, with regard to white persons.

If colored persons cannot testify against white persons, what protection can they have against outrage? The white person may perpetrate any brutality upon colored persons with impunity. There is nothing in the dreary catalogue of crime, from a simple assault to murder itself, which may not be committed with impunity by a white person if no other white person be present. The bare statement of this case is enough. Surely at this moment there should be no delay in preventing such a failure of justice.

But the same failure may occur in the case of white persons. Let a white person be assaulted or murdered, if you please, by another white person, but only in the presence of colored persons, and justice cannot be administered. The criminal will continue at large unpunished.

Therefore, for the administration of justice, that it may not fail to the colored person, and then again that it may not fail to the white person, there should be no exclusion of any citizens on account of color.

Let the witness be admitted always to testify, leaving the jury to be the judges of his credibility. If his story on its face seems improbable, or if there be anything in his manner or conduct or past life to excite distrust, the jury will be able to measure the just weight of his testimony.

It is hard to be obliged to argue this question. I do not argue it. I will not argue it. I simply ask for your votes. Surely Congress will not adjourn without redressing this grievance. The king, in Magna Charta, promised that he would deny justice to no one. Congress has succeeded to this promise and obligation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trusted that after the experience of last night, when the thermometer here rose to ninety-three degrees, I think, and we were all exhausted by a debate on irrelevant matter, the Senator from Massachusetts would not introduce upon this appropriation bill a topic of this kind. I think we have voted this amendment on two other bills during this session. Have we not?

Mr. SUMNER. No. It has been reported by two different committees, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and the select committee on slavery and freedmen, but it has never been definitely acted upon, and for the reason that I have not been able to bring it to a vote by itself. If I had been, I should not move it on this bill; but regarding it now as entirely germane to the subject, feeling unwilling that Congress should separate and leave that injustice to go on so that society may suffer from it, I deem it my duty to take this opportunity to bring the matter before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is distinct that it has not only been introduced here, but that it is now the law in the bill organizing the supreme court of this District.

Mr. SUMNER. It is so; I moved it myself. I can state to the Senator the different occasions on which it has prevailed. It prevailed on the statute emancipating slaves in this District, but on that statute it was only applicable to cases that should arise in determining question of freedom. It was next applied to the statute regulating the judicial system of the District of Columbia, and was made applicable to proceedings in the courts of the District. But it has not been applied beyond that. I have sought to apply it generally; I have moved it more than once on other bills and have failed, and the measure is now pending as a bill by itself reported by the select committee on slavery and freedmen, and it is also pending as a section of another bill reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The proposition, therefore, has the sanction as a general proposition of two separate committees of this body; as a proposition applicable to the District of Columbia it has had the sanction of the Senate twice over, and now I plead with the Senate not to arrest it here.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I am concerned I have always voted and always will vote to make no distinction in the color, condition, form, or nature of a man as a witness. In my own State black men and white men can testify. If I lived in a slave State I would insist on slaves being allowed to testify. But I beseech the Senator from Massachusetts not to load down this, the last of the general appropriation bills, with amendments that are likely to create discussion or controversy between the two Houses. The Senator has accomplished his object in regard to all the courts of this District; but when you propose to change the law of evidence in the different States you make a controverted question that gave rise to a long debate some time since when it was proposed on a post office bill, and that may give rise to debate here. Without going into the merits of the proposition, in which I entirely agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, I hope the Senate will exclude this class of amendments, and keep all general legislation off this appropriation bill. The appropriation to which this proviso is sought to be attached is an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to detect counterfeiters; that is all.

Mr. SUMNER. And to bring them to trial and punishment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that there is no pertinency between the two. This is general legislation in an appropriation bill. It does not qualify the appropriation; it does not relate to the appropriation; it is only likely to create a long discussion on this the last of the appropriation bills. I hope the Senate will exclude it from this bill; and at the proper time I, for one, will join with the Senator from Massachusetts in allowing everybody that is human—and I would include animals who could show signs that could be understood—to testify in a court of justice. I believe the only true way of administering justice is by appealing to evidence from any class of persons who may know the facts, and some celebrated cases have been gained even from the testimony of animals. I agree with the Senator in the general principle entirely; but I hope he will not press the proposition as an amendment to this bill, for I know it will create discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. I believe it is always time to do an act of justice, and I think this Congress ought not to separate now without doing this act of justice. It ought to do it for the sake of the administration of justice. I have not put this case, you will bear witness, on any grounds of sympathy or sentiment or humanity; I plead for it now as essential to the administration of justice, and for one, as a Senator, I cannot willingly abandon the opportunity that is afforded me by my seat here of making this motion, of making this effort to open the courts of my country to this evidence, without which justice must often fail.

Mr. CARLILE. I dislike at this period of the session, with the thermometer, as it is, I believe, at 87°, to take a part in any of the discussions of this body, and I do not intend to detain the Senate longer than a moment or two. I would appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the amendment and allow this subject to rest at least until the next session of Congress. He reads a letter from a judge of the United States court for Virginia, a gentleman known to me and known to the Senate not to be a Virginian, a gentleman who has been educated and reared under a different system from that which has always prevailed in Virginia, and who I have no doubt is sincere and honest in the opinions which he has given in that letter which has been read to the Senate. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts knows very well, as the Senate well know, that we who have been raised under a different system from that which he now proposes to inaugurate, are not prepared at this time for so important a change as he seeks to make. I cannot conceive of anything that would more outrage the public sentiment in a slave State than the fact that the property of one of its citizens had been confiscated upon negro testimony and negro testimony alone; and it is because of some proceedings which have already been initiated in the United States court in Virginia that this legislation is urged in the letter which the Senator from Massachusetts has read.

I know that I differ with many Senators on that subject; but I think we should do nothing that is not absolutely demanded by the emergencies of the times to alienate the feelings of a people whom we seek to bring back within the fold of the Union, and whose loyalty, if they have ever had it, needs more the strengthening influence of this Government than that which is calculated to destroy and paralyze it.

I therefore trust that the Senate will not adopt at this time this proposition. No one knows better than the Senator from Massachusetts how easy it would be for an unscrupulous man, governed alone by his love of gain, to prevail on persons as ignorant as the Senator from Massachusetts has admitted this class of people to be to go into a court of justice, without having impressed on them the necessity of being governed by the strict line of truth, and testify to that which their imaginations may have conjured up and which really has no foundation in fact. If these people are as incapable as the Senator from Massachusetts has admitted them to be by the bill he has now on your table providing for their care and protection, commonly known as the freedmen's bill, if they are incapable of making contracts for themselves, if they are incapable of asserting for themselves their rights in a court of justice, if, because of their ignorance and the dependent situation which they have always occupied in this country, they are in a state not fit to assert the rights that belong to man in a cultivated condition, surely it would be unwise, and I believe it would be inhuman, to place them in the power of unscrupulous knaves by whom they might be induced to commit perjury, and be subjected to the punishment and the pains and the penalties inflicted upon the perjurer. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As this is a proposition in relation to the laws of evidence, I offer an amendment to cover the whole subject; I move to add, "or because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried."

Mr. SUMNER. I am in favor of that proposition taken by itself, but I do not wish to see it put upon this.

Mr. BROWN, (to Mr. SUMNER.) That is just what other people say about yours. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that, but I wish to secure this justice.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to secure the additional justice provided by my amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Well, I will vote for the Senator's proposition by itself. Let him move it when mine is carried.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to say anything about the "nigger" aspect of this case. It is here every day, and I suppose it will be here every day for years to come, till the Democratic party comes into power and wipes out all legislation on the statute-book of this character, which I trust in God they will soon do. But, sir, I will speak on the general principle of allowing a party to testify. The rule of the common law, as we know, prevented parties to the issue from testifying. In my not very extensive practice at the bar I have found that the more strictly the principles of the common law and the rules of evidence as established by the common law are adhered to, the more is justice promoted and the better are the rights of parties secured. I shall vote perhaps for this amendment as an amendment to the "nigger" proposition, but standing independently, I should not vote for it, for I think it is a most unwise species of legislation.

As to this question of negro testimony, the settled policy of the States where negroes are to be found has regulated it from time almost immemorial, and every one acquainted with that species of population knows the absolute danger there is in its admission. Uncultivated, barbarous almost, brought for the first time into court with all the temptations they have to testify falsely, with none of that clear perception of the truth or the consequences attaching to the statement of falsehood; the imagination can scarcely conceive the deplorable results that would follow from the admission of such testimony.

Mr. HOWARD. We already have a statute which has been in force about two years, if my memory serves me, allowing parties to be sworn in proceedings in the circuit court of the United States, and I think in the district court. My honorable friend from Illinois shakes his head. I have to inform him that we have such a provision, and that I have practiced under it myself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no such United States law.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the law is in that regard that the same practice shall obtain in the district and circuit courts of the United States as prevails in the courts of the State where the district and circuit courts are held. If the courts of the Senator's State allow it to be done, of course the district and circuit courts of the United States would follow the same rule.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no law of the United States about it.

Mr. HOWARD. It would be more satisfactory far for me to see that provision incorporated in a separate bill or act. Allow me to say one word on this subject. The honorable Senator from Delaware appears to be full of apprehension of evil to arise from the admission of colored people as witnesses upon the stand. He seems to think that they are entirely unfit to present themselves as witnesses or to be listened to as witnesses. They are entirely ignorant according to him; too ignorant to be admitted upon the stand as witnesses according to his idea; and not only too ignorant but too much inclined to tell lies, if I understand him aright, too much inclined to falsehood to be admitted to testify in courts of justice.

Now, sir, I shall not deny that the great mass of colored people, of a certain grade of colored people at least, are ignorant; but I shall not admit, for I think truth would not justify me in admitting or in asserting, that colored persons of a certain grade are any more inclined habitually to falsehood than white persons are. That has not been my experience. And certainly we do not reject witnesses in courts of justice because they are ignorant. It is a rule of the common law, to be sure, that if a person is so ignorant as not to know the existence of a God he is not allowed to testify until he has been properly instructed. That rule, however, we have never introduced in practice in the United States. The general principle is that every person may be used as a witness who has arrived at years of discretion, and it is for the court to determine upon examination of the witness whether the witness has arrived at years of discretion, whether he is able to distinguish between truth and falsehood, and whether his memory has become so mature and strong as to be likely to retain an accurate picture of the facts as presented to his mind. That is the rule, and the only practical rule which exists, I believe, now; and after all, the true test to be submitted to a court or a jury is, is it probable under the circumstances that the witness has told the truth; is the witness of sufficient credit to be believed, taking into consideration his knowledge, his opportunities to observe the fact, and his character for truth and veracity?

I can see no objection in any case that can possibly arise to a black witness being placed in these respects upon precisely the same grounds with a white witness. Is it to be presumed at the outset that because a man has a black skin he either cannot or will not tell the truth in court? It seems to me that those persons who object to the examination of black persons as witnesses on the ground that they are black put it upon this most unphilosophical and I may add most inhuman and cruel presumption, that a negro either cannot or will not tell the truth in any case. I shall be guilty of presuming no such thing. I will put the case upon the same ground upon which the case of every white witness is placed by the common law; and that is that the jury, if the case be one before a jury, is to judge of the credibility of the witness and of the amount of credit to be given to his whole story.

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will modify his amendment so as to have it apply only to civil actions, I will vote for it. I cannot vote for a proposition to allow a party charged with counterfeiting in a criminal action, or any other felony, to be a witness in his own case; but if he will confine his amendment to civil actions I will vote for the proposition, for I am in favor generally of parties testifying in courts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to inserting the words "in civil actions."

Mr. CARLILE. I object to that modification. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the power to modify his own amendment, no vote having been reached nor the yeas and nays ordered on it.

The amendment of Mr. BUCKALEW, as modified, was read, as follows:

Nor in civil actions because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be adopted. I hope we shall approach the decision of the other question by itself, vote yeas and nays on the other question.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—yeas twenty-one, nays not counted.

The question being taken on the amendment as amended by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Comess, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Salsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Ramsey, Riddle, Ten Eyck, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That section eleven of an act entitled "An act for the release of certain persons held to service or labor in the District of Columbia," passed April 16, 1862, and also that part of the first section of an act entitled "An act making supplemental appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1863, and for the year ending June 30, 1862, and for other purposes," passed July 2, 1862, which reads as follows: "To enable the President to carry out the act of Congress for the emancipation of the slaves in the District of Columbia, and to colonize those to be made free by the probable passage of a confiscation bill, $500,000, to be repaid to the Treasury out of confiscated property, to be used at the discretion of the President in securing the right of colonization of said persons made free, and in payment of the necessary expenses of their removal," be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed so as to interfere with any expenditure that may have been incurred by carrying into effect the parts of acts above repealed, or any expenditure necessary to fulfill existing engagements in relation thereto.

This section simply repeals two appropriations that were made in 1862, one of $100,000 and the other $500,000, and the money placed at the disposal of the President to aid in colonizing all negroes that were made free by the emancipation act in the District of Columbia. I will state also that I submitted this proposition to the Secretary of the Interior here last evening and he said it was right and ought to be passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if the appropriations have not already lapsed and if there is any occasion for the repeal now. Two years have transpired since the appropriations were made.

Mr. WILKINSON. The law has been partially carried out and they have a commissioner here who is drawing a large salary; an establishment is kept up. There is a man by the name of Mitchell, I believe, at the head of it, who is the commissioner of colonization; and he is paid out of this very appropriation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota what is the salary paid to the Rev. Mr. Mitchell. What is the amount? He speaks of it as very large.

Mr. WILKINSON. I know nothing of the amount. I only know there is such an officer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know what is the salary given to Mr. Mitchell, but I believe it is the salary given to a clerk.

Mr. WILKINSON. I presume it is $1,800.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hardly think it is so large as that, though I do not undertake to say. I wished to correct the impression made by the Senator. It is not a large salary. I do not know whether his services are worth that amount or not.

Mr. WILKINSON. It is very legitimate to save expense to the Government whenever we have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. When the bill which is now offered as an amendment came up a few weeks ago, I objected to its consideration for the reason that we had called on the President for information as to the situation of the fund. Some three months ago the Senate passed a resolution introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] calling upon the commissioner of emigration for a report as to the situation of this fund. We have received no report. Yesterday or the day before the Senator from Kentucky renewed his resolution asking for a report of the commissioner of emigration, which has not been answered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I will state in respect to the question he is now discussing that I know but very little about it myself; I do not know what are the duties of the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, but I received a letter from him yesterday on the subject of this report which was called for. I suppose this was the resolution. He copies it:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish the Senate the report of the commissioner of emigration for 1863, with his account of existing contracts, and other necessary information on the question of emigration."

Mr. Mitchell says:

"It is due to the Senate and writer to say that this resolution, although called for and the call regularly forwarded to the Department of the Interior, has never been sent to me for a report."

It has never come to him.

"I have such a report as my imperfect files would enable me to make, the most valuable files, such as those relating to the Chiriqui and other contracts, having been withdrawn from this office. With your permission I will publish the report at the opening of the next session."

It amounts to just this, that the resolution has never gone to him, nor has he been called on to make a report. Of course it would come from his office, but he has never been required to furnish the report.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is true that the Rev. Mr. Mitchell is commissioner of emigration, at a salary of $1,500. He has an office in the Patent Office building. I should like very much to have an account of this fund. If, however, it is thought best to repeal the appropriation before getting that report; I will not enter any objection; but it is due to the Senate, after having twice called for this report, that they should have it and let us know what it is.

Mr. NESMITH. I ask whether the repeal of the appropriation would not necessarily repeal the commissioner and prevent him making a report.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That is a question I prefer to submit to the Senate. By the repeal of the law he will of course go out of office. But the resolution referred to was a call upon the President to furnish a report from the commissioner of emigration. The repeal of the law abolishes the office of the commissioner of emigration. Now, while I think the salary of the commissioner should stop, I should like very much if the office could be continued so as to get a report from him.

Mr. WILKINSON. There is a very able report made by the Secretary of the Interior in answer to a resolution that I offered long ago, and those papers were referred to the committee on freedmen, and they are so voluminous that the committee, I suppose, did not propose to have them printed. I have looked through them, looked through all that part that was interesting so far as relates to this proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be sustained by the Senate, and that we shall here and now get rid of this idea of colonization. We have paid I do not know how much, for we do not seem to be able to find out, for that folly. Let us save the balance that has not been thrown away on it. We sent a few persons out of the country and they came back again in the most wretched possible condition. I think the whole idea of it, to men of comprehension who had studied this subject in the country, was a folly when it was tried. It is now exploded.

I believe last summer a member of the Cabinet, when Washington was menaced by General Lee's army, went all the way to Concord, New Hampshire, to tell ten or fifteen thousand people of New England that we ought to colonize the freedmen. It received but little support there, and received little support anywhere else. The whole idea has exploded. We have lost several thousand dollars on it. Now let us save the balance by adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the idea of deportation is exploded, but I do not agree with him as to the separation of the two races. I am one of those who believe that we shall be compelled to arrange for the colored people a separate community, that they cannot live and enjoy equal liberty with us where we are the majority race. I have a bill, as is known to the Senate, disposing of this very fund, converting it to the acquiring of western Texas and opening up western Texas as a home for the colored race. I believe that that will be the policy which will be finally adopted by our Government, not to use any force, but to give to the colored race the voluntary opportunity of separating from us and going where they can be the majority race, where we can under a territorial form of government care for them until they can so far improve as to govern themselves.

That to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is this: while I think this proposition ought to be adopted perhaps, I do not wish to lose the opportunity of getting a report from the commissioner of emigration, Rev. Mr. Mitchell, whose character for integrity is unimpeached and unimpeachable. I do not wish to prevent his being able to make a report to the Senate as to the disposition that has been made of so much of the fund as has been used.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas how the adoption of this amendment would prevent an inquiry into the expenditure of the money that has been already expended.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have said that it abolishes the office.

Mr. GRIMES. The records will be there.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I submit to the Senator from Iowa whether we should not amend the amendment in some way to retain that power over the commissioner of emigration.

Mr. GRIMES. In all human probability the Senator and the Senate will be able to reach the very facts that he desires to reach more adequately and with more dispatch if we abolish the office under the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, than he would be able to secure it under the law as it now stands. If we adopt the amendment, although we abolish the office, we do not abolish the records, we do not destroy them, we do not destroy any of the vouchers that are in the hands of the accounting officers of the Treasury, and all the Senate has to do is to get transcripts from those vouchers.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think this law should be repealed as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. I think it was ill advised in the first instance; but under the circumstances in which we were at that time it was quite natural that it should be done. From what has occurred since, as stated by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] it is now manifest that that advice was in point of fact unauthorized, the whole thing was wrong. But when my friend from Massachusetts states that it was wrong, perhaps the public would suppose that the error was in the legislative branch of the Government alone. Now, if I recollect aright, the proposition came from the President of the United States. I do not think I am mistaken as to that. The mistake, therefore, if it has turned out to be a mistake, as I think it has, is a mistake that had its origin in that quarter; and the Congress of the United States was but seduced into the error by the judgment of the Executive of the nation, upon whose judgment at that time it was in the habit of placing implicit reliance, and among other members of Congress who relied implicitly upon that judgment, I think perhaps there was no one who was more remarkable in that particular than my friend from Massachusetts. He has found out since that it was rather an unsafe reliance. I thought so then; I think so now—not that the President of the United States meant to do anything wrong, not that he had not exercised all the judgment which he possesses, but that he like most men fell into error. All that I object to is that we should apparently—or rather my friend from Massachusetts, because I was not here to be seduced—be made to suffer almost exclusively for the errors of judgment of the gentleman who was the incumbent of the presidential chair at that time, and whom my friend and his friends have selected to be the incumbent of the same chair for some four years hence. My hope is that the tendency to error which exhibited itself in this particular will not exist during the next four years, provided—I cannot help saying provided, because I do not think it certain—provided he is reelected for four years more.

Now a word or two in answer to the suggestion made by the honorable member from Kansas. He agrees that this foreign colonization as contradistinguished from the domestic colonization to which he adverts ought to be put a stop to, but he is in favor of the domestic colonization. He is in favor of it upon the ground that the two races cannot live together. Now, in one respect, and only in one respect, do I agree with the honorable member from Kansas. They cannot live together in social and political equality. The legislation of the free States I think illustrates that. New York, as far as political equality is concerned, by an overwhelming vote decided that they could not be admitted to the enjoyment of the elective franchise. Illinois, one of the now large and still growing States of the West, has decided the same thing. Ohio has on her statutes a variety of laws which say substantially the same thing. And socially, without law, it seems to me to be obvious that no equality is to be had. I think, to use a phrase very common with the honorable member from Massachusetts farthest from me [Mr. SUMNER,] that is a matter which is decided by instinct. If it be an instinct, of course it is a natural feeling, not a prejudice, unless Providence has thought proper to instill into us for our moral ruin such a prejudice. That I do not believe. But I believe that as they have lived among us in the past in a state of slavery without either social or political equality, and as those who have been made free have lived among us quite prosperously, in the enjoyment of a great deal of individual happiness, and of social happiness too, after they shall have been all set free they may remain among us still in the enjoyment of the same prosperity and happiness individually and socially. They will mix with each other; they will supply the demands of labor which have always been great in the past and will be greater in the future; they will be the laboring population of the country, and an excellent laboring population they are if they can be made to be contented; and if they are left alone they will be contented.

I think, therefore, differing in that particular from my friend from Kansas, that numerous as they are and let them all be set free, four million of them, in a white population which, according to my theory, will be the dominant population, of thirty-two million, to be doubled and quadrupled after a few years, they will find employment enough, valuable to themselves, valuable to the whites of the country, and not only valuable in a material sense, but accompanied with all the social happiness which it is possible for them in my view to attain when they are continuing among us.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. Having been raised in a slave State he is presumed to have a better knowledge of this question than one raised in a free State. I had the privilege of discussing this question at length before the Senate some months ago. I will put a case to him. Suppose this rebellion is crushed out and amnesty and pardon extended to the rebels now in arms against the Government with their slaves freed: in his opinion could those slaves freed remain in the community in immediate intercourse with the masters that formerly owned them, they being free against the will of the master?

Mr. JOHNSON. I answer the honorable member that those who have been made free in the past have lived there without the slightest obstruction, and not only lived there without disturbance, they have been protected; and I say what I know, that in the South there never has been a controversy involving the right to the freedom of a negro in which the whole feeling of the men of the South, if the case was one in which freedom was really the right of the individual claiming it, has not been in favor of the application; and they have never failed to obtain professional aid, not by the ordinary means in which professional aid is acquired, but gratuitously.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is it not within the Senator's knowledge that most of the slave States, if not all of them, have required by law that the emancipated slaves be removed from within the boundaries of the States?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know. But when? Only lately. And why lately?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let us not differ as to facts. I remember a society that is called a colony in my old congressional district in Indiana that were settled there, being required by the law of the State from whence they came to remove from that State.

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Let us vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no desire to continue the debate, and what I have said was not because I supposed there was any danger of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota meeting with any serious opposition in the Senate, but merely for the purpose of correcting what I supposed to have been an error, so far as responsibility was concerned, into which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had fallen, and for the purpose of expressing the opinion which I entertained that these people may reside among us but not in a condition of social and political equality.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say one word. Here we are discussing this amendment that I undertake to say there is not to exceed one member of the Senate, and I doubt if there is any one opposed to, at four o'clock in the afternoon with the thermometer at ninety degrees. I beseech Senators, if they do not want all of us to get sick, to take a vote on this proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to make a motion that at four and a half o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. HOWARD. My reason is this: the Pacific railroad bill has been sent to us from the other House, and I am very anxious in the course of this evening to take it up and act upon it in the Senate. We shall have some amendments probably. I wish to send it back to the House of Representatives soon, so as to have a committee of conference at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that after our several evening sessions this week we ought to do more than pass this bill to-day. We are about through with amendments; there is no opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, I think. Let us vote, pass the bill, and then adjourn. I think we are all tired enough.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be no necessity for evening sessions if we can have an honest, fair understanding that we shall stay here quietly until the business of the country is finished, if it be till the middle of August.

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know what is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] asked unanimous consent to interpose a motion that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess till seven o'clock.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion being objected to, it cannot be entertained while there is another subject before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not withdraw it; let us go on quietly; we have got plenty of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] to the civil appropriation bill.

Mr. HICKS. I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate, but I desire here to raise a voice of warning to extremists on both sides of this Chamber. There are those here who on all occasions, if it is possible to wake up and bring in the negro, never fail to do it; and on the other hand there are those who with or without propriety endeavor to wake up the corpse of Democracy. I say to these extremists, beware; you are treading on dangerous ground. Gentlemen on the other side (with most of whom I generally act in this Chamber) seem to act as if the rebellion were put down, while gentlemen on this side of the House seem to think that nothing is more certain than that the Democratic party will soon again come into power, and that then all the clouds of war will disappear and the clear sunlight of peace again illumine our path. If gentlemen will drop these exciting questions as to the colored population, remain quiet, and let things take their natural course, in my opinion the country will soon be restored to quiet and peace. As to bringing into power again the Democratic party, I am entirely unable to decide as to which would be the greater calamity, the success of the rebellion or the resurrection of the Democratic party. I believe the one would be about equally ruinous with the other. In the early years of my life, in the days of Jeffersonian Democracy, I was a Democrat, I voted the Democratic ticket; but I never belonged to the modern Democracy, and God forbid that I ever should unless there shall be a perfect regeneration of it, which I do not expect.

But, Mr. President, my object was to protest against the introduction of these irrelevant propositions. What relevancy this amendment can have to the bill under consideration I have not been able to discover. We are now, I hope, approaching the close of the session; but if the course indicated by some gentlemen were pursued I doubt whether we should get away from here before the 3d of March next. We should get along much better in these halls of legislation if gentlemen would only be quiet and let the negro alone for a while; it would be better for us, better for the country, better for the negro himself. Only yesterday the convention assembled to revise the constitution of the State of Maryland passed an ordinance of emancipation. No man is more gratified at the action of that body than myself; but it seems to me that as Senators we have something else to do here besides continually talking on the slavery question. I am decidedly in favor of the establishment of a Freedmen's Bureau. I desire to see these poor creatures protected and taken care of in the best possible way.

I differ with the Senator from Kansas as to the feasibility of sending them and colonizing them in a hurry. It may be done at last, and I would rather see it done provided they can be comfortably taken care of in that way. But if you hasten that question and mix it up with the effort to put down the rebellion I fear the result. Time is consumed, injury is done, the people become disaffected, many conservative loyal Union men are driven away from the ranks of the Union party by the continual effort of some gentlemen here not only to render as odious as possible the slaveholding population, but to place the negro suddenly and at once upon an equality with the white man. I read in my Bible that the Creator took six days to create the heavens and the earth. Some gentlemen appear to think that they can work out this great problem in twenty-four hours. I think it will take a long time to legislate suitably and properly to protect and take care of the colored population. I have no idea that we ought to pass such a bill as was under consideration a few days ago. I have let a portion of my slaves go into the Army and the rest go free. I want to see the slaves in the whole country emancipated; but I do not want them to be practically reduced to slavery again; I do not want negro-drivers to go from the North or the middle States or the border States or anywhere to control and make money out of my negroes; I want them to go free and have the benefits of their labor for themselves. As my colleague has properly remarked, we get along with the free negroes in Maryland very well. Leaving out Baltimore-city, there are more in my county than in any other county in the State, and they get along very well; we have no trouble with them. They are employed by the whites; some own land, some rent land, and they are a useful class. Some of our white people will not labor always when they have a chance, but these colored people are constantly employed generally, and they live happily, comfortably, and respectfully. They do not want your interference on their behalf. But some gentlemen, from the time they wake up in the morning until they go to bed at night, it seems to me, think of nothing except the negro.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say to the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. HICKS] that there is no necessity in my judgment for his announcement that he would not join the Democratic party. Let me tell him, with all kindness and respect, that we have got about all we want down in his neighborhood, and we have put up the gate, so that if he wanted to get in he is a little too late. The Democratic party is going to succeed, notwithstanding the awful apprehensions the gentleman has, and it is going to succeed without any more additions to it from the locality where he resides. If he had made application some eight or ten years ago, and had proved by his works that he was a sound convert to the faith, we should have no objection to letting down the bars; but as it is, we cannot take him in; we have enough without him.

Mr. HICKS. Let me say to my friend from Delaware that whenever I make application to be admitted into that party I have no doubt they will take me in readily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line one hundred and seventy-five of section two:

To enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to pay a debt incurred by the Commissioner of Patents in preparing the agricultural report for 1861, and transferred to the account of the Agricultural Department, in pursuance of an opinion of the Attorney General, of September 18, 1862, $3,704 05.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is if the amendment comes from a committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does it come from a committee?

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Agriculture have directed me to propose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That until otherwise directed by law the Territory of New Mexico and the Territory of Arizona shall constitute one surveyor general's district; that the Territory of Idaho shall constitute and be a part of the surveyor general's district of Colorado; that the Territories of Nebraska, Dakota, and Montana shall constitute one surveyor general's district; and that there shall be but one office of the surveyor general for each surveyor general's district; that the provisions of this section shall be executed under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Nebraska" where it occurs. Kansas and Nebraska are now one surveying district, and have been for years.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa to agree to that modification of his amendment?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so amended by the consent of the mover.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands what district Utah is in.

Mr. HARLAN. I think Utah is now a part of the district of Colorado.

Mr. CONNESS. Are you certain?

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is so.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I suggest to the chairman to add Nevada to Utah and Colorado, and make it a part of that district. There is every reason for making that arrangement and not continuing it as it is now by a very unwise provision, as I think, part of the California district. In the first place the district of California is sufficiently large for any one surveyor general, with its thousands of questions, involving complications and surveys, and in the next place Nevada is divided from California by the greatest range of mountains in the country. There is really no reason for ever having placed it there, and I hope that Nevada by this act will be transferred to those two Territories. It immediately adjoins Utah Territory, and they have direct communication, their people are spreading from the one to the other, the general complexion of the country is the same, and it will contribute to order and regularity, and I think be very much more acceptable to the community. I make that motion as an amendment, that "Nevada" be added after "Idaho," so as to say "Idaho and Nevada."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce—

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I should like to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall get through with the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. Resolutions have been passed over all this week, and there is no possibility of getting them in unless irregularly.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are just at the close of this bill, and we can have it reported to the Senate in five minutes if Senators will wait. I do object to everything that is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution cannot be received, being objected to.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to offer an amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of the harbor of Frankfort, in the State of Michigan, with an estimate of the cost of erecting piers said harbor suitable for the protection of vessels engaged in commerce and for vessels of war; and the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose, to be paid from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There was an application before the Committee on Commerce for an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of this harbor on Lake Michigan; but the evidence was deemed insufficient by the committee to justify such a recommendation. From the best information we could get on the subject from the War Department, the people in that vicinity regard this improvement as of very great importance to the commerce of the lake, and they have done something in the way of improvement by erecting piers by private enterprise, and there were plans and specifications for the improvement, but they had not been adopted by the War Department, and we cannot get sufficient information from the War Department to justify a recommendation for an appropriation for these improvements. But as it was rendered somewhat probable that the improvements contemplated would be of importance to the commerce of that lake, the committee deemed it not improper to make the present recommendation, which would authorize the Secretary of War to make a survey of the harbor and of the improvements which have been made by voluntary contribution and private enterprise, and report the facts to Congress for a future appropriation. I believe that is all there is of the case.

MR. SAULSBURY. I hope this amendment will not be adopted, and I wish to state my reasons, in all kindness to my friend from Maine. I tried to get the Committee on Commerce to report an appropriation for building a pier near the mouth of the Delaware bay, at Lewes, in Delaware, where any person acquainted with the location knows it is absolutely necessary, necessary for the benefit of the shipping interests of the country, and in time of war absolutely necessary, because for a considerable portion of the winter the Delaware river is frozen over. We have a railroad extending very near that place, designed to go to that place. It would be for the advantage not only of local interests but of great national benefit to erect a pier there; but the Committee on Commerce have persistently refused to make such a recommendation. If they refuse these benefits to one section of the country and to one location where they are absolutely necessary, I hope the Senate will not sanction favoritism by voting for appropriations for another section of the country where they would be less beneficial.

The amendment was rejected.

MR. WADE. This bill has entirely omitted to make any appropriation to pay the salaries and expenses of the government of Montana. I believe the usual appropriation for the Territories for paying the officers and legislative purposes has been about $50,000.

MR. SHERMAN. Twenty thousand dollars. There is an appropriation generally for the other officers specifically, and then $20,000 for the Legislature. The Senator will find it in the legislative bill.

MR. WADE. I will change it to $30,000, if that is the proper sum.

MR. SHERMAN. I will furnish my colleague with the amount in the legislative bill for the other Territories, and just hand it to him after the bill is reported to the Senate.

MR. WADE. Very well. It ought to be provided for.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

MR. GRIMES. I desire a separate vote on the appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of Schoolcraft's Indian books.

MR. DIXON. I wish a separate vote on the item of $12,000 to make up a deficiency in the contingent expenses.

MR. HENDRICKS. I ask a separate vote on the provision on the subject of testimony in the courts of the United States relative to the competency of witnesses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments named will be excepted.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments excepted will be read in their order.

The Secretary read the first excepted amendment, which was to insert:

To pay Henry R. Schoolcraft for one hundred copies each of the two additional volumes to complete his work entitled Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, to be paid under the direction of the Joint Library Committee whenever he shall deliver to said number of copies printed and bound in as good style as the volumes already published under authority of Congress, to be done within three years, $10,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next excepted amendment was

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for miscellaneous items for the Senate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $12,730.

For deficiency for Congressional Globe for the present session, $25,065 12.

MR. DIXON. I did not except to the last item, but to the first. I move to amend by striking out "$12,730" and inserting "$15,000," and I will state the reason for this amendment. Since the original amount was furnished to the Committee on Finance, some bills have been presented which have swelled the sum necessary to be appropriated to $15,000—about three thousand dollars of bills.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The remaining excepted amendment was to insert at the end of section three:

Provided, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in civil actions because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried.

MR. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. SHERMAN. It is due to myself to say in explanation that I voted against and opposed this amendment for the sole ground as I stated that it ought not to be put upon this bill. That is my deliberate conviction yet; but as the Senate have by a majority vote decided to put the amendment on the bill in spite of my remonstrances and resistance, I feel bound now to vote according to my conviction on the merits of the proposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Hendricks, Hicks, Nesmith, Powell, Salsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Harding, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was concurred in.

MR. SUMNER. I now renew the proposition which I made in committee in the shape of a new section:

And be it further enacted, That sections eight and nine of the act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," which sections undertake to regulate the coastwise slave trade, are hereby repealed, and the coastwise slave trade prohibited forever.

I have but one observation to make. It seems to me this Congress will do wrong to itself, wrong to the country, wrong to history, wrong to our national cause if it separates without clearing the statute-book of every support of slavery. Now, this is the last support that there is in the statute-book, and I entreat the Senate to remove it.

MR. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

MR. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I voted against this amendment before on the ground that I did not like to vote for such measures on appropriation bills; but two or three others have been put on, and if this is to be legislated upon, as I am in favor of the abolition of the coastwise slave trade, I shall vote in the affirmative.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Salsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, McDougall, Ramsey, Riddle, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

MR. WADE. I offer the following amendment to come in after the appropriations for the "survey of the public lands."

Montana:

For salaries of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs, chief justice, two associate judges, and secretary, $9,700.

For contingent expenses of said Territory, $1,000.
For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

This is taken from the legislative bill for Nevada; the same appropriation was made for that precisely.

MR. CONNESS. There is only one objection that I have to this appropriation, and that is it proposes to pay the salary of a number of gentlemen who have been without employment, I presume, until recently in the East. They were sent out into the West to fill some very high offices and govern a people that they never saw before. In that respect I think it is against the genius of our institutions, and I do not hesitate to say in addition that it is against a good and wise administration. I suppose, as they have been appointed, it is only just to them that they should be paid. I do not know that these reasons will control my vote on the subject, but it is the only objection I have to the amendment.

MR. WADE. The amendment has no reference whatever to the time they have served. I suppose we have a rule with regard to that, and this appropriation does not control that subject at all. It leaves the appropriation to be paid when they have earned their salary according to law. That is all.

MR. CONNESS. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories misapprehends the nature of my objection. My objection lies to the selection of Governors, judges, and officers of western Territories from eastern States, a practice more honored in the breach than the observance.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. I am directed to offer an amendment to come in between lines one hundred and sixty and one hundred and sixty-one of section two:

To aid the State of Kansas in constructing a free bridge across the Republican river on the Fort Riley reserve, $5,000.

That is leaving the State to pay one half and the Government the other. I hope it will be done. I shall be compelled to ask for a division on this question, but before doing so I desire to state that this bridge is right close to Fort Riley and on the reserve, and the Government will use it fully as much as the people, and the proposition now is that the State pay one half the expense to build a bridge on the Government land and the Government the other half.

The amendment was rejected—ayes five, noes not counted.

MR. CHANDLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amount of money appropriated for the surveying of lands in the Territory of Dakota was reduced from $15,000 to $5,000, in line one hundred and sixty-one of section two. I believe the Committee on Finance understood what they were doing when they reported the proper sum, and it ought not to have been reduced.

MR. WADE. I moved that amendment from the Committee on Territories, and it was placed there by that committee on the statements made by the Delegate from that Territory, who informed us that $5,000 would be sufficient for the purpose; that it was a mountainous region, that the arable land was very small, and they would not want at present a very large amount for surveying, while for bridging the streams of the Territory there was eminent necessity for a larger appropriation. He advised us to reduce the appropriation for surveying and apply the money to the other purpose of building bridges and the like, for he informed us that during the fall and winter season there were streams there which it was all but impossible for people to get across so as to have communication from one place to another. I do not know anything more about it than that. Whether the amendment lessened the amount for surveying too much, I do not know. I leave it to the Senate to say.

MR. WILKINSON. I hope this motion to reconsider will not succeed. I believe that the action of the Senate in committee was correct. I do not believe that the requirements of that Territory demand that more land than would be surveyed under this appropriation should be surveyed during the coming year; and I think it is of infinitely more importance to the Territory that these roads should be opened through it. There is not a great quantity of very good land in the Territory of Dakota; it is confined to the country bordering on the streams. It is generally destitute of timber, and is composed of arid sandy plains. To make an appropriation to survey those vast plains at this time, in my opinion, would be unwise and uncalled for, and I hope, therefore, that this motion to reconsider will not prevail.

Mr. HOWARD. I received a few days since a letter from the surveyor of the Territory, Mr. Hill, who is an acquaintance of mine, in which he expresses his most sincere wish that the appropriation may not be reduced, in which he states that there is just as much need there now as there ever was in any Territory to proceed with the public surveys. I know him very well. He is an intelligent, active, vigorous, enterprising man, a man upon whose judgment I should rely in such matters with the greatest respect, and I know that he is opposed to this reduction of the amount appropriated to carry on the public surveys. I believe that this reduction from $15,000 to $5,000 has been upon the suggestion of a gentleman, the Delegate from that Territory, who is very unfriendly, personally, as I understand, to Mr. Hill, the present surveyor. What motive he can have for this interference is more than I can say; but I believe that the reduction has been recommended chiefly at his instance. It is sufficient for me, however, to follow the suggestions of Mr. Hill, the present surveyor, who understands the necessities of the Territory much better than any of us, and certainly as well as the present Delegate from that Territory.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan how long the surveyor general has been in Dakota, and where he went from.

Mr. HOWARD. He went from the State of Michigan. He is a citizen of my State, and has been in that Territory for I think three years. He has been home to his residence once or twice during that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that there are no estimates of the cost of these bridges, and I understand that it is a mere thieving proposition to come in and propose to build bridges without estimates, and steal money. That is what I understand to be the fact in the case. There are no estimates, no propositions from any source; but the Delegate comes in and says we want some bridges. Very well. You know how we build bridges out West. We generally lay a corduroy log and put a little earth on top, and it is a bridge.

Now, sir, I understand this proposition to be to take off $10,000 from the honest surveys of that Territory, and put it into a stealing fund, so that they can build bridges without estimates, without requisitions, and without being wanted, and somebody will pocket the money, and that is all there is to it. I want these lands surveyed, so that honest men can go in and take up the lands and pay for them like honest men, and I do not want any stealing. I want this thing done honestly, fairly, squarely, upon estimates, upon fair propositions, and I hope that vote will be reconsidered, and that the Committee on Finance will be sustained. I stand by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE. It is exceedingly easy to talk about stealing and all that. I might with exactly the same propriety say that the surveyor wanted a job there to survey these sterile, barren mountains that will probably never be occupied in the world, for there is very little good territory there, and survey it as often as you please it will never be taken up for any purpose I know of. There may be some mining regions there that are good; but all the good lands that want surveying and where settlers will go for a long time to come are along the rivers and water-courses that run through that Territory. The idea of going into a general survey of that mountainous, sterile region now is preposterous. Is it not as necessary that you put the Territory in a condition so that settlers may get into it across the rivers and occupy properly that portion of it which is good for anything as it is that the barren mountains that never will be inhabited should be surveyed?

Sir, it looks more like stealing to get a great job under the pretense of surveying these barren mountains. That looks to me more like stealing. I can conceive very well that an honest settler moving in there with his wagon and his family in order to cross these perilous streams wants a bridge, and he wants a road; but what in God's name he wants of a survey where a catamount cannot get over, I do not understand. The stealing is all on the other side. The Senator is contending for surveying land that will never be sold if you do survey it, and there will be time enough twenty years hence to survey it if anybody is fool enough to want it.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have not said a word on this bill. I think we have made a great mistake in admitting this Territory at all. It seems to be in position to steal either one way or the other. That is the whole object from what we now hear. I am sorry to hear that people steal in the way of surveying public lands and building bridges. I should like to have the vote establishing that Territory reconsidered.

Mr. WADE. I do not like to be charged in this way. There is considerable good arable land there, but the country is more valuable for mining purposes than any other. That is the fact about it; and it is settling up with that view. The agricultural country where settlers are to come in and occupy the land and want it surveyed for that purpose is along the water-courses, but there is no necessity for surveying the mountains.

Mr. TEN EYCK. My object was simply to change the current of the debate, with a hope that we might get a vote.

Mr. HARLAN. I have doubt whether this appropriation should be reduced from $15,000 to $5,000; and then an additional appropriation is proposed to build bridges on a military road. We all know that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is very careful in his estimates; he has been attempting to cut down these appropriations to the lowest figure possible consistent with the public service. In every surveyor general's district the attempt has been made to reduce it to the very lowest cent that will survey the lands that will be needed by settlers during the coming year, and I think it is more safe to rely on his judgment in the matter than to rely on the statement of the Delegate who comes here for a year or two years, and asks to have a change made from surveys to bridges.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that a large tract of country has been acquired by treaty this winter on the west side of the Red river; the best settlements they have; and they have a home population that do want surveys undoubtedly.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate reconsider the vote on concurring in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan?

The motion to reconsider was rejected—ayes seven, noes not counted.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. POWELL. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill. I want to vote against it. I think there is iniquity enough in it to contaminate the nation.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Connors, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Hendricks, Powell, and Saulsbury—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, and Wright—13.

So the bill was passed.

BRIDGE OVER REPUBLICAN RIVER.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of the construction of a bridge over the Republican river on the Government reservation at Fort Riley, and that it be recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. WADE, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 495) to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 495) to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows, namely:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to so much of the second amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike out the fifth section of the bill, and agree to so much of the said amendment.

That the Senate recede from so much of their said amendment as proposes to strike out the sixth section of the bill.

B. F. WADE,

W. T. WILLEY,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. PRICE,

E. B. WASHBURN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADE. I can inform the Senate in a moment of all there is in it. The House of Representatives passed a bill requiring the cars to run on Sunday the same as on other days. The Senate struck it out. The House agree to the amendment of the Senate on that subject. Then there was an amendment to the effect that no person should be excluded from riding in the cars on account of color. That is retained, the House agreeing to the Senate amendment. Then there was a section of the bill providing that the location of the railroad through the Capitol grounds might be changed running to certain points that it would take some time to explain to the Senate. Believing that it was not necessary, at this time at all events, to change the location of the road or indeed until the grounds were laid off, so that we may know really where it ought to be, we struck that section out, and the House of Representatives agree to that amendment. Then there was a further proposition in regard to running the cars, that tickets should be sold at four cents a ticket where a dollar's worth was purchased. The Senate struck that out, but the Senate recede from that amendment, and that section stands as part of the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Does that leave the cars run on the Sabbath day?

Mr. WADE. It leaves them just as it finds them. They may run for all we know. There is no law against it that I know of, and it does not compel them to run on the Sabbath. We make no enactment on the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Connors, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Howard, McDougall, Riddle, Sherman, and Wright—12.

So the report was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint reso-tutions, which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 187) to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and her Britannic Majesty for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies;

A bill (H. R. No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 512) to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves;

A bill (H. R. No. 519) repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 551) to incorporate the Colored Catholic Benevolent Society;

A bill (H. R. No. 554) to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane by an exchange of land;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) correcting a clerical error in the award of the emancipation commissioners; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) to declare the construction of a joint resolution for the relief of W. B. Matchett, approved June 20, 1864.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the question taken now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has gone from the possession of the Senate, and therefore the motion cannot be received.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the report has been concurred in by the other House. I should like to have the Senator state his reasons, and act on it now. It is too late in the session to reconsider for light reasons.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire it to be understood that it is for light reasons at all. While the chairman was present I asked to make a motion that the report be printed. It is the most important legislative measure of this session; it is to affect the people that I represent very much to their injury in my judgment. I thought it was but a reasonable thing that I should be allowed to make a motion to print, but I was answered that the bill which has just now passed was then before the Senate, and that motion could not be made. I gave the subject no further attention, but in four or five minutes some gentleman came to me and told me the tax bill had passed, much to my astonishment, for I had some suggestions to make against the report of the committee. These are the circumstances under which I feel it to be my duty to make a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion cannot be entertained without a previous order of the Senate to send for the papers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A motion to reconsider, I suppose, is always in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will cause the rule to be read. It cannot be entertained after the papers have gone.

The Secretary read the 20th rule, as follows:

"20. When a question has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof; but no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after a bill, resolution, message, report, amendment, or motion upon which the vote was taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate announcing their decision; nor shall any motion for reconsideration be in order unless made on the same day on which the vote was taken, or within the two next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Where is the report of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been sent to the House of Representatives, and concurred in there as the Chair is informed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When will the papers be here so that I can make the motion which I have a right to make as a Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will not be here again. They go to be enrolled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the report to the Senate never come back to the body in the course of business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may in some instances, but not in a case of this kind. It is the final action of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose the Senator can move that a message be sent to the House requesting the return of the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will see on Monday about what I shall do.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

SALE OF RESERVED LANDS.

Mr. HOWE. The other day I presented a bill at the request of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which it is very important should pass at this session. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who is also on that committee, have seen it; and the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the House of Representatives has seen it and has agreed to get it passed there at once if we pass it. I move to take it up. It is a bill in reference to the sale of public reserves.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 315) in relation to the sale of reservations of the public land was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever any reservation of public land shall be brought into market under existing laws the Commissioner of the General Land Office may fix a minimum price, not less than $1 25 an acre, below which the land shall not be disposed of.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO WASHINGTON STREETS.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas obstructions on the streets and reservations of Washington by buildings or other constructions were declared by the Government authorities in 1859 to be violations of law because not authorized by the charter of the city; and whereas said obstructions have not been removed, but others are added which mar the appearance of the city, interrupt light and ventilation, and add to the nuisances already existing at the canal: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire and report whether any provisions of law additional to that approved June 12, 1858, be necessary to enforce the removal of said obstructions by the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, said law making it his duty to cause obstructions of every kind to be removed from streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the city of Washington as have been or may be hereafter improved in whole or in part by the United States, and to keep the same at all times free from obstruction; also "if any person shall place any obstruction upon the streets, avenues, or sidewalks aforesaid, such person shall pay the cost of removing the same, and shall moreover be subject to a penalty of ten dollars, to be recovered as other debts are recovered in the District of Columbia, for each and every day the said obstruction may remain after the Commissioner shall have given notice for its removal."

FEES OF DISTRICT JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose we might as well concur in the amendments, though I should prefer that the amendments had not been made. The principal amendment limits the aggregate fees of the clerk of the supreme, circuit, and criminal courts in this District at $4,000, instead of $6,000 as we passed the bill. It is a very laborious office, and I would have left it the same as the other offices; but the House of Representatives has limited it to $4,000. The general law limits the fees of all marshals, district attorneys, and clerks throughout the United States to $6,000, including the clerk in this District. The House of Representatives amends this bill by limiting the clerk in this District to $4,000 a year, and also by putting in a proviso that the district attorney shall be allowed two per cent. in revenue cases in addition to the $6,000. I think $6,000 is enough, but I shall not make the point if the Senate think proper to concur.

The amendments were concurred in.

DIRECT TAXES IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill (S. No. 171) further to amend an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved June 7, 1862, be taken up for consideration, with a view of leaving it as unfinished business for Monday. I am informed by officers of the Treasury Department that in their opinion this bill will affect the revenues of the Government several hundred thousand dollars. The bill must go to the other House to be passed there; I have been endeavoring for a fortnight to get it up here, but have failed altogether. I wish to have it taken up now so that it may be left as the unfinished business to come up on Monday. I think it will not occupy over fifteen minutes.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 25, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, of Boston.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, of New York, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

UNITED STATES PROPERTY.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a privileged question, to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the Pacific railroad bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and withdraw that motion.

The bill being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. BROOKS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

The House divided on ordering the main question; and there were—ayes 39, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAWSON moved that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER stated that, having counted the House, and no quorum being present, the motion was in order.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Gouch, Grinnell, Hall, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Law, Long, McAllister, McIntosh, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Perry, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Strouse, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Woodbridge, and Yeaman.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. A quorum has answered, and I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 33, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cole, Cresswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, English, Fenton, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kalbfisch, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrison, Amos Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Upson, Webster, Wilson, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bailly, Bliss, Boutwell, Chandler, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, John O'Neill, Orth, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Stiles, Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grinnell, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Lazear, Long, McAllister, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, Strouse, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—74.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. PRUYN stated that he was a stockholder in this company, and therefore would refrain from voting.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the unfinished business, which was House bill No. 75, further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the bill lose its place?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Clerk will read the 56th rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules."

Mr. SCHENCK. When the bill was before the House formerly amendments were offered and voted on, and among other amendments the second section was stricken out. Some other amendments were adopted, and also another amendment was offered by the gentleman from New York, I believe, which is yet pending. However that may be, all these amendments have been printed, and there has been printed another amendment in the shape of a substitute for the whole bill, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.] The amendment I offer is a substitute for that substitute. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert what I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, as provides for a commutation in money, to be paid by persons enrolled or drafted for military service, in lieu of actually rendering such military service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter no payment of money shall be accepted or received by the Government to release any enrolled or drafted man from obligation to perform military duty.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, at his discretion, at any time hereafter order a draft for soldiers to serve for a less period than three years: Provided, however, That no such draft shall be for a less term of service than one year.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall accompany any order for a draft of men for military service with a notice that he will accept volunteers in lieu of such drafted men prior to the day appointed for the draft, to fill the quota or any part thereof of any town, township, ward, precinct, or election district or of any county not so subdivided; and every person so volunteering, in lieu of a man to be drafted, shall be credited to such town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, or county not so subdivided; and if he volunteers and is accepted and mustered into the service for a term of one year, unless sooner discharged, shall receive and be paid by the United States a bounty of $100; and if for a term of two years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $200; and if for a term of three years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $300, one half of which said bounty shall be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into the service, one fourth at the expiration of one half his term of service, and one fourth at the end of his term of service. And in case of his death when in service, any portion of his bounty then remaining unpaid shall be paid to his legal representatives; and in case he is honorably discharged from wounds or sickness incurred in the service while in the line of his duty he shall receive the full bounty. And the President in any call or order for a draft shall specify the exact time of service for which such draft is to be made, and the volunteers accepted in lieu of the whole or any part of the quotas to be provided under that draft shall be for not less than the term of service for which that draft is ordered.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, when mustered in, shall be organized into or assigned to regiments, batteries, or other organizations of their own States, and, so far as practicable, shall, when assigned, be permitted to select their own regiments, batteries, or other organizations, from among those of their respective States which at the time of assignment may not be filled to their maximum number.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years, under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged, and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court martial may direct.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for fifty per cent. in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district, as provided by said section.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, instead of traveling pay, all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation from their places of residence; and persons discharged at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation to their places of residence. That any persons, resident in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, or Arkansas, who may voluntarily enlist in the military service of the United States, for a term of not more than three years or during the war, or not less than one year, shall be entitled to the benefits and privileges of existing laws, and such persons shall be mustered into the regiments, or other organizations, of whatsoever State they may elect, or, in the case of colored troops, shall be assigned as now provided by law. And the States, or subdivisions of States, procuring such enlistments shall receive credit for such persons, in accordance with the laws in other cases: Provided, That such enlistments as are authorized in any State, under the provisions of this act, shall only continue until such State shall have been made subject to a call for troops: And provided further, That no enlistments shall be made of any soldier, either in or out of any State, except those enumerated herein, unless full credit is given to the State to which the enlisted soldier belongs.

Mr. ODELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio one question. I ask him whether this substitute as it has been read and proposed as a substitute for the original substitute is reported from the Military Committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not reported from the Military Committee. I have offered it after consultation with the Military Committee, and with many members of the House. And if gentlemen, instead of asking me questions, will permit me to go on and briefly explain what I have offered, perhaps I shall anticipate all their questions, and answer them. I request as a special favor that gentlemen will not interrupt me, because I am scarcely able to be here to-day to make what remarks I desire to present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman whether he proposes to allow amendments to be offered to the bill, or will he call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. This amendment is itself an amendment to an amendment, and no amendment in the third degree is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean after that amendment is acted on.

Mr. SCHENCK. The regular business is open to amendment, I understand. This is a substitute, and, being in the nature of an amendment to an amendment, cannot be itself amended.

The SPEAKER. But the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to strike out the third and fourth sections can be amended by an amendment germane to it.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the original bill open now so that a substitute can be moved?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because a substitute is already moved as an amendment to a substitute. The bill is pending, and a substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL], and an amendment to that, by way of a substitute, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK].

Mr. COX. Is this bill substantially the same bill the House has voted against already, and rejected?

The SPEAKER. The House has not as yet rejected any bill, as the Chair is informed. They have amended a bill but not rejected it.

Mr. COX. What is the precise position of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill stands as it was, except the second section, which was stricken out by the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] moved a substitute, and now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moves another substitute. The bill itself has not been rejected.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a question of order. It is to inquire of the Speaker at what time it will be in order to offer an amendment to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] does not demand the previous question on the motion to amend the amendment, an amendment to the original bill will be in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope I shall be permitted to proceed to explain what I propose to do. I do not propose to call the previous question when I shall have got through with my explanation. I propose to leave the original bill open to amendment. It may become necessary, at this late hour of the session, to close debate, and if the debate be protracted I may seek to do so. In the mean time I want this substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to be before the House, that we may after a while have a vote upon it as a whole. Being a motion to strike out and insert, it is not divisible. The House will have to take the whole of it together, or to reject it altogether. Under these circumstances I shall proceed to explain as briefly as I can the character of the substitute which I offer.

I have preserved in it as its first section the idea of dispensing with commutation—that there shall be no commutation in money in lieu of service. I have left out the provision that there shall be no substitution, that seeming to be the will of the House. My impression has always been that if we dispense with commutation we had better also dispense with substitution, for the reason that substitutes would run up in price beyond the reach of men of limited means. That, however, does not appear to have been the sense of the House, or of the Senate, if I may judge from the bill on the Speaker's table from that body. I accommodate myself to that view, seeking to correct it by subsequent provisions of the bill to encourage volunteering, and thus to take away much, if not all, of the difficulty that arises from permitting substitutes.

I repeat, my amendment dispenses entirely with commutation; it leaves the law in reference to substitutes to stand as it now is. It also retains a portion of the third section of the original bill as printed, providing that the President may, in his discretion, order a draft for a less period than three years—for one year. With some verbal amendments the third section is the same as in the printed bill, with the addition of an amendment already voted on and adopted in the House to the original bill, to come in at the end of the eighteenth line of the fourth section. After providing that bounties should be paid—$100 for one year, $200 for two years, and $300 for three years—it is further provided that in case of the death of a soldier in service any portion of his bounty then remaining unpaid shall be paid to his legal representatives; and in case of the honorable discharge of a soldier from wounds or sickness incurred in the service while in the line of his duty he shall receive the full bounty.

The sixth and seventh sections of this substitute, being the same as the fifth and sixth of the original bill, are still left, and I believe they are not objected to. They provide for adding, as the old law did, fifty per cent. to the number drawn, so as to leave a margin, and not necessitate the frequent repetition of the draft. They also provide for paying transportation to persons going to and from the place of rendezvous when they have been drafted.

Then I introduce three sections that are not, in any shape, or the matter of them, in the bill before the House. I propose to introduce as the fourth section a provision that drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, when mustered in, shall be organized into, or sent to, regiments, batteries, or other organizations of their own States, and shall, so far as practicable, select their own regiments or batteries from among those of their own States which at the time of the assignment may not be filled to their maximum number.

The object of the amendment is to keep, as far as possible, drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, within the organizations of their States. Of course it will be impracticable to put them into an organization of their own selection if this organization was full. It provides, moreover, that into whatever regiments they are placed they shall be kept within their own State organizations. They are not to be carried into the regiments of other States even as substitutes or drafted men.

The fifth section provides for an amendment of the twentieth section of the enrollment bill passed by this Congress. The twentieth section of that bill contains a clause placing it in the discretion of the Secretary of War to discharge any minor under eighteen years of age who shall have enlisted without the consent of his parents or guardians.

There seems to have been some difficulty in the practice under this law because of the discretionary power placed in the Secretary of War, who held that inasmuch as the old law held the minor to service when he had sworn to his age, and did not permit any proof to be given that he was under eighteen years, and that he had not the consent of his parents or guardians, he had no power to discharge such enlisted man. The committee regarded the question in relation to the minor under eighteen years of age as one between the Government and his parents or guardians, and not as between the Government and the minor.

The law in the several States of this Union, I believe without an exception, recognizes twenty-one years as the age of majority for a man, and under all ordinary circumstances the parent or guardian has a claim upon the services of the minor under twenty-one years of age. But military law, overriding that, has declared the age of military service to begin at eighteen, and the minor over eighteen years, although not twenty-one years of age, is of course held by the military service, although the consent of his parent or guardian may not have been given. The question therefore in relation to minors between eighteen and twenty-one years of age is one between the Government and the man, but when he is found in the service under the age of eighteen it then becomes a question between the Government and the parents and guardians of the man.

I hold, therefore, that the construction which, because of the oath of the minor under eighteen years of age, notwithstanding the consent of his parents or guardians has not been given, continues him in the service against the will of his parents or guardians is wrong. I hold, and the Military Committee hold, that it should be construed as intended by the committee in the first instance, and as I believe the House intended, to require such minor to be discharged if required by his parents or guardians. This section, therefore, provides that if upon proof that the minor under eighteen years is in the service against the consent of his parents or guardians, and upon the payment by them back to the Government of his bounty and advance pay—upon compliance with all these conditions it shall be imperative upon the part of the military authorities to discharge such minor. Notwithstanding the fact that the boy may swear that he is over eighteen, if the proof is that he is under that age his parents or guardians may require his discharge.

There is another clause in this section, and the two constitute the whole section itself, which provides that if hereafter any officer shall knowingly enlist into the service a boy under sixteen years of age, with or without the consent of his parents or guardians, such person so enlisted shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged from the service, and such mustering officer shall be dismissed from the service with forfeiture of pay and allowances, and suffer such additional punishment as a court-martial shall direct. The law prohibits the enlistment of such minors, and we have thought it proper to make it a crime for any mustering officer knowingly to enlist such boys into the service.

We have incorporated into our amendment, too, the provisions of a bill which was introduced into the House in the early part of the session by Mr. Blair, of Missouri, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, reported by them, and passed by the House on the 20th of February last without dissent, authorizing the recruiting and obtaining of substitutes or volunteers in States in rebellion, to be mustered into the regiments of those States obtaining the recruits.

Gentlemen are all familiar with the provisions of this bill, and I need not repeat them. The Clerk has read it at the desk as a part of my substitute. Gentlemen will find it as bill No. 261, and I have proposed it, slightly modified, as a separate section of my bill.

Having thus explained the bill I have but a remark or two more to make. The bill presented now is a bill by which I have sought to remove objections, and to commend it to gentlemen who seemed to be opposed to the bill in its original form; and though I have stricken out, as a matter of vital necessity, in the present condition of affairs as we have good reason to believe and know, that feature recommended as an amendment to the law by the President, the policy of commutation, yet in other respects the sections of the bill following, I think, are of such a character as will commend it to the consideration of gentlemen who were opposed to the bill as originally introduced.

I have left in the provision allowing substitutes, but I have proposed a system which will encourage volunteering, and by which the people of a particular neighborhood will, as I remarked once before, be encouraged to act as a mutual aid society to avoid the necessity of a draft by making up a sufficient number to fill their quota. And to enable them further to do that, I have proposed that when the President makes a call for one year he may accept volunteers for one year, and pay $100 bounty in addition to whatever inducements may be held out by the neighborhood.

Then I go further, and take away some of those features of the bill which seemed to be harsh because they permitted minors to be held to service. I offer a provision, too, to save the objection which has been made that persons might be taken away from regiments of their own State, or separated from men enlisted or drafted from their own neighborhood. The provision requires that they shall, so far as possible, be put together in regiments by themselves, with men from their own neighborhood, as well as in companies of their own States.

Then to meet the other difficulty about filling up the quota of States where it is said the male population is exhausted, I add bill No. 261 as a part of this, a bill which has already commended itself to the House, and been passed by a large majority, but permitted to sleep upon the table of the Senate.

I might occupy the time of the House in speaking of the essential importance of acting upon this subject speedily, firmly, and decidedly, so as to sustain the Administration of the Government in its attempts now to carry on this war to a successful termination. I repeat only, however, the conviction of my own mind, and it must be that of most gentlemen here, that the President would not make his application to us without reason.

It is essential, on account of the expiration of the term of service of persons now enlisted, and who by regiments are continually going out of service, and because of loss in battle and otherwise, to make some stringent legislation to fill up the ranks of the Army, or even to keep up the Army to its present standard. For one, I am not satisfied with that, but that is essential, and to do that this bill is essential. It is equally essential not only to keep the ranks full, but to go beyond that, and to put and keep in the field a force so much superior to any the rebellion can muster in order to put down as speedily as possible this rebellion. For this rebellion must be put down; if not this year, the next, if not next year, one year, ten years, twenty years hence, no matter how long, for the simple reason that a peace made to-day upon terms proposed by some gentlemen upon this floor, as every sensible man must know, would be a peace that would not last thirty days. If we ever recognize this southern confederacy as a distinct nationality from these United States, they living upon that side, and we upon this, of a border line extending from the mouth of the Potomac to Mexico, thousands of miles, we may expect a marauding guerrilla warfare, and murders and robberies, and everything else which can disturb the peace of a nation. Nothing but an effectual putting down of the rebellion will put peace upon such ground that peace can only stand on. And I would not give a farthing for peace made upon any other terms than the effectual crushing out of this unholy rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, I go even further than that. Time was when I, conservative in my party, believed that we might live with the people over the border, they having their peculiar institution of slavery, and we not; time was, not only when I believed, but, believe now, that this war was commenced on their part, not upon ours, entered on and prosecuted on our part not with any view to put an end to slavery, not making that the object of the war, although that would be the inevitable consequence; but when, dissatisfied with the guarantees of the Constitution and the laws passed under it, the South threw the sword into the balance; when they said that these guarantees of the Constitution and the laws were not sufficient for them, but that the sword should give them stronger and further privileges, and enable them to make a slavery crusade; when war came upon these terms, I say that although the war was not made to put down slavery, the consequence was as inevitable as fate that the result would be that slavery would be ended. As the war has progressed from month to month, we have seen that that is the inevitable result.

I do not believe that peace now made upon any other terms than that this shall be a free republican country throughout all of the States which compose it will last. I do not believe if a slave were to escape from one of those States and should come into a State which did not recognize slavery that there would be a possibility of reclaiming that slave. It is natural to expect that those who recognize that property would not be satisfied with that condition of things, and would attempt by force to do that for which there is no law. If the guarantees of the Constitution and the laws passed under that Constitution were not sufficient when we were together as one nation, surely it will not be expected that when separated by war we could accomplish by treaties, or compromises, or mutual arrangements as between independent nations, what we could not peacefully do and maintain between States of the same Government. Therefore I say that I believe no peace would last unless based upon the submission of the rebels in these States to the Constitution and the laws of the land, and that submission accompanied by doing away with that which has led to it all, with the institution of slavery which has been the source of all the evil.

With the convictions I have received I would no more attempt to heal up the wounds of the body-politic leaving that irritating cause there, than I would expect effectually to cure the body of one of our poor soldiers shot by a rebel bullet leaving the ball in to fester and irritate and fever the physical condition of the man. I do this because I think it right and proper to have it understood why I believe it essentially important to strengthen the Army; to keep its ranks full; to be sure of putting down the rebellion; for until the rebellion is put down upon such conditions, your compromises, your peace, your armistices founded upon any other understanding will not be worth the paper on which they are written.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel that it devolves upon me, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and in the minority in regard to the repeal of the commutation clause, which is the question now before the House, to occupy the attention of members for a few moments. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether I understood him rightly in stating that there was no provision in his proposed amendments for substitutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. It leaves the law in regard to substitutes just as it is now. It does not dispense with substitutes.

Mr. ODELL. I have listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio in relation to the amendments he proposes to this bill of the committee. I know of none to which I object, unless those relating to the striking out of the first and second sections of the original bill, which repeal commutation, and allow no substitutes except father or brother of the person drafted.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the repeal of the commutation clause; and I have many reasons which are satisfactory to my mind for my opposition to it. I know very well the position which I occupy in being now in favor of retaining that which two years ago I voted against; liable to the charge of inconsistency I know I will be. I am free to say that, as a member of the last Congress, when the first conscription was passed, I voted against it, because it contained this commutation clause. I must in candor say that when I went home to my constituents and mingled with them I found I had made a mistake. The provision which I thought discriminated against the poor man was regarded favorably by the poor man, and the operation and enforcement of the law demonstrated this truth.

Gentlemen on the other side will probably refer to that vote. But the provision is found to be acceptable to the people. In many portions of the country, in my own city and State, there are thousands of men who have exempted themselves from military service for three years by paying the $300 commutation, as provided by the act approved March 3, 1863, section thirteen, and they have in their pockets the certificate of the Government. But the bill presented by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs deprives those who may be hereafter drafted from having the same privilege as those already drafted have had. The State of New York and many other States have furnished their quotas. Many States have had no draft, and therefore the enactment of this law would be a discrimination against them. The gentleman from Indiana says that his State will be in that condition. So will Illinois and New Jersey and many others. I think we ought to legislate in this matter so as to let the people understand that we have a fixed principle and purpose about this thing.

Another serious objection to the proposition to repeal the commutation provisions of present laws, and which further proposes that no substitutes shall be furnished outside of the drafted man's family, is in the fact that in the operation of such a law it would be most destructive in its tendency to the commercial and mechanical interests of the country. While we should legislate to reinforce our armies in the field, and pass such laws as shall do it speedily and efficiently, yet it is only the part of wise statesmen to do it with as little oppression to the business of the country as may be. The bill proposed would not rapidly, as experience has shown, fill up our armies, and would tend to destroy our commercial and industrial interests. The authorities have tried both systems, drafting and volunteering, with bounties, and my conviction is the latter has proved the more efficient mode of raising men.

I know that the gentleman has told the House that this bill is absolutely necessary for reinforcing the Army. I do not fall one whit behind that gentleman, and I am surrounded by men on this side of the House who feel as earnest and anxious as he or any other man can be that the Army shall be reinforced and the Government sustained. The State which I in part represent was among the first in this war, and will be the last out of it. The appeal made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to pass this bill, and thus to indicate that we mean to sustain the Government, falls without effect upon me and upon others by whom I am surrounded, and upon the thousands whom I represent.

The gentleman's colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and my colleague on the Committee on Military Affairs, stated, a few days ago, that the vote given here—which was against the repeal of commutation, and a very decided one it was in its majority—was a vote to stop the war. I should like to know from the gentleman from Ohio what right he has to criticise the votes of gentlemen on that occasion, and from whom does he obtain his authority to lecture the members thus voting. I disclaim his right to say that we are for stopping the war. I am no more in favor of stopping the war until the rebellion is subdued than either of the gentlemen from Ohio. But I believe there is a better way to reinforce the Army than is now proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe that the third and fourth sections of the bill which provides for a draft for one year, and pays bounty of $100 for one year, $200 for two years, and $300 for three years, will do all we need done in the way of reinforcing the Army. It will be done by voluntary enlistment, with the bounty which the bill provides. I have not the facts and figures which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] presented here the other day; but all that he said about them was true. They were the worst cases that the provost marshal could pick out. The State of New York stands to-day four thousand men ahead of the demands of the Government. The city of New York, with its large Democratic majorities, which is often referred to by gentlemen on the other side, not in terms of commendation for loyalty, is nineteen hundred men ahead, to-day, of the demands of the Government.

There are now organizations recently formed of the best men of the city of New York, men of influence and wealth, for the very purpose that the Army may be reinforced, that men may be induced to volunteer, and that a draft may be avoided. So also with the city of Brooklyn, from which I come. The people of that city are willing and anxious to aid the Government in every possible way, as they have been from the beginning of this wicked rebellion. Our municipal and county authorities are both ready and willing to coöperate with the General Government in this laudable work of adding men to our armies in the field. They are ready with labor and means both to aid the President and Secretary of War. But we have our opinions about this matter. It may be unwise, I hope it will not be considered unpatriotic, that we differ with the President, with the Secretary of War, and with the Provost Marshal General of the United States; but, sir, my conviction is as clear as it can be upon any question that if our armies are to be reinforced by such men as the Government want, and by such as all of us desire to have in the field, they will be reinforced by volunteering under such inducements by bounties and compensation as may be necessary to accomplish that purpose.

The House clearly indicated its sentiments upon this subject the day before yesterday, and I hope we shall stand fast to the position we then assumed and not be forced into concurrence with the position which is now assumed. I have no fears as to what the result may be if that position is adhered to, in my own State nor in any other State in this Union. The men will be furnished. It is down deep in the hearts of the people of this Union that this Government is to be sustained, that it is to be saved, and with none stronger than with the party with whom I act. There is no party in this country more earnest in their desire or determination to sustain this Union than the Democratic party. We are for carrying on this war until the rebellion is put down; and, as the gentleman from Ohio remarked, let it be long or let it be short, the war must go on until it reaches a successful result. New York will be found ranged side by side with Ohio and every other State that is ready to place all the men, all the money, and all the power of the country at the disposal of the Government rather than fail in the accomplishment of that object. This Union is to be preserved. Ay, sir, and we believe that we have men enough and money enough, ships, shot, and shell enough to put down this rebellion. You may rest assured it will be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. ODELL] has seen fit to refer to a remark which I made on the last occasion when the proposed repeal of the commutation clause was before the House. I do not think he intended to misrepresent me, yet he did so.

I did not take it upon myself to criticise the individual acts or votes of any member of this House. But, sir, it is my right to animadvert upon the action of this House, and the effects of its policy. This right I have hitherto used in such manner as I deemed proper; and while I have the honor of a seat in this body I shall continue to use it. On that occasion I did, as the gentleman states, declare it as my opinion that we had reached a point in the progress of events where we must decide to repeal the commutation clause or give up the successful prosecution of the war. I did not then believe, nor do I now believe, that the vote then taken was such a decision; but I did believe, and I yet believe, that if the policy indicated by that vote shall be persisted in, if the commutation clause be permanently retained in the law, if no more efficient law be passed this session for filling up our armies and supplying the waste of battle and disease, the rebellion cannot be put down during the lifetime of the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

I go further. If this Congress shall leave the law as it now stands and the next Congress repeals the folly, I do not believe the rebellion will be put down during the continuance of the next Congress, nor at all while the incubus of commutation weighs down the present law. In my judgment that clause stands directly in the way of filling up our armies.

Mr. Speaker, it has never been my policy to conceal a truth merely because it is unpleasant. It may be well to smile in the face of danger, but it is neither well nor wise to let danger approach unchallenged and unannounced. A brave man, like a brave man, desires to see and measure the perils which threaten it. It is the right of the American people to know the necessities of the Republic when they are called upon to make sacrifices for it. It is this lack of confidence in ourselves and the people, this timid waiting for events to control us when they should obey us, that makes men oscillate between hope and fear; now in the sunshine of the hill-tops, and now in the gloom and shadows of the valley. To such men the morning bulletin which heralds success in the Army gives exultation and high hope; the evening dispatch announcing some slight disaster to our advancing columns brings gloom and depression. Hope rises and falls by the accidents of war as the mercury of the thermometer changes by the accidents of heat and cold. Let us rather take for our symbol the sailor's barometer, which faithfully forewarns him of the tempest and gives him unerring promise of serene skies and peaceful seas.

No man can deny that we have grounds for apprehension and anxiety. The unexampled magnitude of the contest, the enormous expenditures of the war, the unprecedented waste of battle bringing sorrow to every loyal fireside, the courage, endurance, and desperation of our enemy, the sympathy given him by the monarchies of the Old World as they wait and hope for our destruction, all these considerations should make us anxious and earnest, but they should not add one hue of despair to the face of an American citizen, they should not abate a tittle of his heart and hope. The specters of defeat, bankruptcy, and repudiation have stalked through this Chamber, evoked by those gentlemen who see no hope for the Republic in the arbitrament of war, no power in the justice of our cause, no peace made secure by the triumph of freedom and truth.

Mr. Speaker, even at this late day of the session I will beg the indulgence of the House while I point out some of the grounds of our confidence in the final success of our cause, while I endeavor to show that though beset with danger we still stand on firm earth, and though the heavens are clouded, yet above storm and cloud the sun of our national hope shines with steady and undimmed splendor. History is constantly repeating itself, making only such changes of programme as the growth of nations and centuries requires. Such struggles as ours, and far greater ones, have occurred in other ages, and their records are written for us.

I desire to refer to the example of our ancestors across the sea, in their great struggles at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, to show what a brave nation can do when their liberties are in danger and their national existence is at stake. There were two periods in the history of that contest when England saw darker days than any we have seen, or, I hope, ever shall see. Consider her condition in 1797. For ten years the tide of mad revolution had been sweeping over Europe like a destroying pestilence, demolishing thrones and principalities, and, while many evils were swept away, chaos and anarchy were left in its track. In 1792 France declared war against the world; and in February, 1793, specifically declared war against England. At that time the British debt was $1,268,663,045, and its annual interest $45,225,304. The population of the United Kingdom was less than twelve millions, including Ireland—Ireland then as now "the tear in the eye of Great Britain," a source of weakness rather than strength. The spirit of revolution pervaded the kingdom from collieries to court. The throne distrusted the people, and the people were jealous of the power of the throne. In 1794 the habeas corpus act was suspended against an opposition in Parliament more determined and far abler than its suspension met in our Congress two years ago. In 1796, three and a quarter million Catholics in Ireland were organized to revolt against the Government, to be aided by a French fleet of forty sail with twenty-five thousand French soldiers on board. But for the storm which dispersed the fleet the revolt must have been successful.

In the same year the naval power of England was threatened with dissolution by a wide-spread mutiny in the fleet. Ship after ship deserted the fleet off Cadiz and in the North sea. The Channel fleet ran up the red flag of mutiny from almost every mast-head, and was drawn up in line of battle across the mouth of the Thames, prepared to bombard London if the demands of the mutineers were not acceded to. It required all the firmness of the king and his Government to save the city and the navy. In 1797, oppressed with financial disaster, the Bank of England suspended specie payment, and paper money (an immense circulation of which crowded the country) was the legal currency for twenty-two years thereafter. In that fifth year of the war, Alison says:

"Everything seemed to be filling at once. Their armies had been defeated, the bank had suspended payment, and now the fleet, the pride and glory of England, appeared on the point of deserting the national colors."
"Public creditors apprehended the speedy dissolution and the cessation of their wonted payments from the treasury. Despair seized upon the three per cents were sold as low as forty-five after having been nearly one hundred before the opening of the war. Never during the whole contest had the consternation been so great, and never was Britain so near the verge of ruin."—Volume 4, page 235.

All this time France, with frenzied activity and enormous power, was dealing deadly her blows. In Parliament the great Fox was leading a powerful opposition against the Government. (Though we have no Pitt to lead us, we at least have no Fox to lead our enemies in this Congress.) The record of their divisions would answer for our own. Alison says:

"So violent had party spirit become, and so completely had it usurped the place of patriotism or reason, that many of the popular leaders had come to wish anxiously for the triumph of their enemies. It was not a simple disapprobation of the war which they felt, but a fervent desire that it might terminate in the disadvantage of their country, and that the republican might triumph over the British arms. They thought there was no chance of any parliamentary reform being carried, or any considerable addition to democratic power acquired, unless the ministry were dispossessed; and to accomplish this object they hesitated not to betray their wish for the success of the moloeratic enemy of the country. These animosities produced their usual effects of rendering the moderate or rational equally odious to both parties: whoever deplored the war was a reputed foe to his country; whoever pronounced it necessary was deemed a conspirator against liberty, and an abettor of arbitrary power."—Volume 4, page 141.

Against such an opposition and such discouragements, the like of which we have not yet seen, England with a brave king, a wise ministry, and a courageous Parliament, rose to the level of the great occasion, passed laws both for volunteering and draft, filled the ranks of her army and navy to more than three hundred and fifty thousand men, poured out her wealth with a lavish hand, renewed the great contest, and continued it, not four years, but five times four years longer.

But England saw darker days than those of 1797. In the beginning of 1812 Napoleon had risen to the height of his marvelous power. The continent of Europe was at his feet. By victorious diplomacy and still more victorious war he had founded an empire which seemed to defy human power to successfully assail it. Every coalition against him had been broken; every alliance had failed. More than half the nations of Europe followed his conquering eagles. From the Vistula to the pillars of Hercules, except the rocky triangle of the Torres Vedras, where Wellington was held at bay by five times his number under a great marshal of France, the continent presented an unbroken front against England. Russia remained in frozen isolation, a spectator of the contest. Only Prussia and Austria followed the lead of England.

Let us consider her condition at this second crisis of her fate. Her population, including Ireland, was about seventeen millions. Her debt had been more than trebled since the beginning of the war, and now reached the enormous sum of $4,000,000,000. Specie payments being still suspended, her paper currency was more than ever expanded. In the beginning of the war she raised from her mines and coined annually about $30,000,000 in gold. But the revolution which swept over South America had stopped the working of the mines, so that before the close of the war the annual British coinage was less than $12,000,000. Her navy was crippled by the war, her commerce ruined by the French decrees and the non-importation act of the United States. Her imports exceeded her exports by $65,000,000, and the balance was paid in gold. For two years her harvests had failed, and in 1812 she paid $21,000,000 in gold for foreign grain to feed her people at home. In that year alone her exports declined $140,000,000. The heavy subsidies to her allies and the payments to her own armies on the Continent were to be in gold. In 1812 she sent $30,000,000 in gold, for which she paid thirty per cent. premium, to Wellington's army in the Peninsula. Her bonds had so depreciated that a loan of £60 increased her debt £100. A short time previous, in the midst of increasing disaster, the reason of the king gave way, and he sat a lunatic on the throne of a kingdom which seemed ready to go down with him in the general ruin. This event added a new and complicated question to the distractions of Parliament, and gave a new weapon to the Opposition.

It is not necessary for my present purpose to inquire whether justice leaned to the side of England or her adversary. It is enough to know that she believed it was on her part a struggle for self-existence and for the constitutional liberty of the world. Inspired with this conviction she stood like a giant at bay, in high debate reasserted the justice of her cause, summoned anew, not the frantic energy of despair, but the inexhaustible reserve of calm Anglo-Saxon courage, the unfathomed resources of English faith and English pluck—a proud share of which I trust this nation has inherited—and, in the face of unexampled discouragement and appalling disaster, summoning to the uttermost the resources of her realm, went out again to meet the man of destiny, whose victories were numbered by hundreds, and whose eagles were followed by half the world. Increasing both taxes and loans, she raised and expended for that year $550,000,000. She filled her navy to one hundred and twenty-five thousand men, and before the year ended six hundred and forty-eight thousand men were arrayed under her banners. Seconded by the indomitable spirit of her people, her armies emerged from the gloom of that nineteenth year of the war, and, marching with unflinching step through three more bloody years and the carnage of Waterloo, she planted her victorious standards on the battlements of Paris, and gave peace to Europe.

And can we, the descendants of such a people, with such a history and such an example before us, can we, dare we falter in a day like this? Dare we doubt? Should we not rather say as Bolingbroke said to his people in their hour of peril:

"Oh, was to thee when doubt comes; it blows like a wind from the north and makes all thy joints to quake. Woe, indeed, be to the statesmen who doubt the strength of their country and stand in awe of the enemy with whom it is engaged."

At that same period one of the greatest minds of England declared the three things necessary to her success:

1. To listen to no terms of peace till freedom and order were established in Europe.
2. To fill up her army and perfect its organization.
3. To secure the favor of Heaven by putting away forever the crime of slavery and the slave trade.

Can we learn a better lesson? Great Britain in that same period began the work which ended in breaking the fetters of all her bondmen. She did maintain her armies and her finances and she did triumph. We have begun to secure the approval of Heaven by doing justice, though long delayed, and securing to every human being in this Republic freedom henceforth and forever.

Mr. Speaker, it has long been my settled conviction that it was a part of the divine purpose to keep us under the pressure and grief of this war until the conscience of the nation should be aroused to the enormity of its great crime against the black man, and full reparation should be made. We entered the struggle, a large majority insisting that slavery should be let alone, with a defiance almost blasphemous. Every movement toward the recognition of the negro's manhood was resisted. Slowly, and at a frightful cost of precious lives, the nation has yielded its wicked and stubborn prejudices against him, till at last the blue coats cover more than one hundred thousand swarthy breasts, and the national banner is borne in the smoke of battle by men lately loaded with chains but now bearing the honors and emoluments of American soldiers. Dare we hope for final success till we give them the full protection of soldiers? Like the sins of mankind against God, the sin of slavery was so great that "without the shedding of blood there was no remission." Shall we not secure the favor of Heaven by putting it completely away? Shall we not fill up our armies? Shall we not also triumph? Was there in the condition of England in 1812 a single element essential to success which we do not possess to-day?

Observe the contrast. Her population was less than seventeen million. Ours to-day is twenty-five million in the loyal States alone.

Her debt was more than $4,000,000,000, its annual interest $161,000,000; ours is $1,720,000,000, and its annual interest $71,000,000.

The balance of imports was $65,000,000 against her. In 1863 the balance was $79,621,872 in our favor.

She bought grain from foreign nations to feed her people. We feed our own and send an immense surplus to foreign markets.

Her mines yielded from twelve to fifteen millions of bullion annually; ours are now yielding $120,000,000 a year. More than half of all her payments were made in coin purchased at a heavy premium; we pay nothing in coin but $50,000,000 of our interest and the salaries of our ministers and consuls abroad.

She crossed the sea to meet her enemy on foreign soil; we on our own soil, in a country that has been ours since the foundation of the Republic.

She fought to maintain her rank among the nations of Europe; we fight to maintain our existence among the nations of the earth, and to preserve liberty and union for ourselves and our children's children.

If the example of England fails to inspire us, let us not, I beseech you, forget our fathers of the Revolution. We have seen no day so dark as were whole years in their struggle. We have seen no captures of Philadelphia; no winter quarters at Morristown, no blood-stained snows at Valley Forge. Out of a population of three millions, one quarter of whom adhered to the enemy, they sent to the field three hundred and ninety-five thousand eight hundred and ninety-two men; one for every seven women and children in the colonies. Were we to double our armies to-day we should still fall far behind that proportion.

Who can compare their resources with ours and not blush at the mention of failure, the suggestion of defeat? Do we, with power almost unlimited, with resources as yet untouched, the balance of trade in our favor, every branch of industry flourishing, and everything in its proper place except the Congress of the United States, do we talk gloomily of the issue of this contest?

I believe, sir, that the worth and manhood of a nation must be tried by the same standard that tests the worth and manhood of individual men. We can never know what stuff a man is made of till we see him brought face to face with some desperate issue, some crisis of his life in which he must peril all in one noble effort or shrink ignobly away into the coward's oblivion. If, summoning all his untried manhood, and flinging into the scale his honor, his fortune, and his life, he goes down to the trial, we know that to him "there's no such word as fail." So, sir, a nation is not worthy to be saved if in the hour of its fate it will not gather up all its jewels of manhood and of life, and go down into the conflict, however bloody and doubtful, resolved on measureless ruin or complete success.

"Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum serient ruinas."

But no ruin awaits such a nation. The American people have not yet risen to "the height of the great argument," nor will they until those who represent them here are ready with unselfish devotion to walk in the rugged path that leads to victory.

If we will not learn a lesson either from England or our revolutionary fathers, let us at least learn from our enemies. I have seen their gallantry in battle, their hoping against hope amid increasing disaster, and, traitors though they are, I am proud of their splendid courage when I remember that they are Americans. Our Army is equally brave, but our Government and Congress are far behind them in earnestness and energy. Until we go into the war with the same desperation and abandonment which mark their course we do not deserve to succeed, and we shall not succeed. What have they done? What has their government done—a government based in the first place on extreme State rights and State sovereignty, but which has become more centralized and despotic than the monarchies of Europe? They have not only called for volunteers, but they have drafted. They have not only drafted, but cut off both commutation and substitution. They have gone further. They have adopted conscription proper—the old French conscription of 1797—and have declared that every man between sixteen and sixty years of age is a soldier. But we stand here bartering blood for money, debating whether we will fight the enemies of the nation or pay $300 into its Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, with this brief review of the grounds of our hope I now ask your attention to the main proposition in the bill before the House, the repeal of the commutation clause. Going back to the primary question of the power to raise armies, I lay it down as a fundamental proposition, as an inherent and necessary element of sovereignty, that a nation has a right to the personal service of its citizens. The stability and power of every sovereignty rest upon that basis. Why can the citizen claim the protection of the Government? Because rights and duties are reciprocal, and the Government owes him protection only as he gives sanction and power to the law by his personal service and the contribution of his wealth. Hence in the name of law he can demand protection. Hence, also, in the name of law his Government can demand his personal service and a contribution from his purse. There are two great muscles that move the arm of sovereignty, the Treasury and the Army.

If a nation has the right to protect itself it must have the right to use these two powers. It may therefore take money from the citizen in accordance with the forms of law. It may take every dollar of every citizen if so much should be necessary in order to support and maintain the Government.

If the nation has the right to the citizen's money has it not equally the right to his personal service? Coercion accompanies the tax-gatherer at every step. The law of revenue rests upon coercion. Without that same coercive power no Government could put a soldier into the field. As well might we claim that the legal basis of the Treasury is a contribution-box, as that the legal basis of the military power is the volunteering system.

I go a step further. Every nation under heaven claims the right to order its citizens into the ranks as soldiers. Great Britain has always held that power behind her volunteering system. In 1798 she made a law first to offer bounties to volunteers, and then to draft her enrolled citizens into the army. No such thing as commutation was known.

Gentlemen talk as though the right to pay $300 in lieu of personal service was one of their inalienable rights guaranteed to us by the Constitution. They forget that until the 3d day of March, 1863, there was never known on this continent such a thing as paying money in lieu of personal service.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to state that England always went with the power to draft. I want to know whether she ever did make a draft; whether she ever conscripted or forced her men into the army?

Mr. GARFIELD. She never conscripted, but she did provide for a draft. Under the law of 1798 she raised her militia for local purposes, and drafted from the militia into the regular army in the field.

Let us look for a moment at our own history in regard to this subject. How were the three hundred and ninety-five thousand men raised for the war of the Revolution? Every colony had laws for calling out its militia and compelling them to serve. By a statute of Maryland a citizen was liable to a fine of £10,000 for a refusal to obey the command when ordered into the field. By a statute of Massachusetts as early as 1693 severe punishments were provided for those who refused to turn out for military duty when ordered. The spirit of personal independence and the protection of individual rights were at least as carefully guarded by the founders of the Republic as they are by this generation, and yet they never doubted the power of the colonies to compel the citizen to serve in the field. It makes no matter whether it be done by the President or a Governor of a State, the same principle is involved.

I affirm again that every one of the colonies raised men by draft. It was a presumed common law right. The Constitution of the United States recognizes the same principle by declaring that "Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union;" and on the 29th of September, 1789, an act was passed (the second military law under the Constitution) giving to the President full power to call forth the militia. That law was extended by the act of May 2, 1792, so as to give him the power to send the militia beyond the limits of their States. In 1795 (February 28) his power was still further extended, and a heavy penalty was affixed for disobedience of the law. In the case of Houston vs. Moore, 5 Wheaton, and also Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheaton, the Supreme Court decided that the law was constitutional, and that the President had the constitutional power to compel a citizen to do military duty.

In the war of 1812 the President called on the States for troops, and when a sufficient number did not volunteer they were obtained by draft. In 1839, when the dispute occurred between this country and England in reference to the boundaries of the State of Maine, a law was passed March 3, 1839, authorizing the President to call forth one hundred thousand men for six months, a period double the length allowed by former laws.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the gentleman whether the law for drafting in 1812 allowed substitutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly it did, but not commutation. The bill before us permits drafted men to obtain substitutes but not to pay commutation.

I say, then, since the beginning of the Government, still further, since the beginning of the Revolution, still further, since the founding of the colonies, the right of sending citizens into the military service has been repeatedly asserted and exercised; and up to the 3d of March, 1863, such a thing as a payment of money in lieu of military service was never known on this continent. Gentlemen must, therefore, abandon the claim that in repealing this clause we are interfering with immemorial usage and inalienable rights.

Even the law of 1863 did not regard the $300 as an equivalent for military service. It provided that the $300 should be paid "for the procuration of a substitute," and was supposed to be a sum sufficient for that purpose. It is now far from sufficient, and the law is even more unjust than at first. If the $300 would always procure a substitute, the military service would not suffer by retaining the clause.

But what are the facts? The President, the Secretary of War, our own knowledge of affairs, tell us if it be retained it will be impossible to fill the places of the eighty-five thousand hundred days' men who will go out of service in a few weeks; and of the three years' regiments whose terms of service are every day expiring. Moreover, we must allow something for the waste of battle, the waste of disease, and all the incidents of war. And now, while our armies are advancing gloriously, while our campaigns are prosperous, while there is no immediate cause for alarm, let us look into the future and provide for its emergencies; let us hold up the hands of the President and remove this obstacle from the law, as he recommends. Gentlemen doubt what the people will say and how they will feel. I have learned that the people are braver than their Representatives. I would much sooner take the counsel of the American people, and especially of the American Army, than of the timidity of their Representatives when an election is at hand. Would to God there were no presidential election to cast its shadow over this battle summer, and no congressional elections overshadowing this House. Perhaps we might then see with clearer vision the interests of the country, and strike toward them with bolder hands.

This I do know, that the loyal people have laid up a great oath on the altar that they will never rest till the rebellion is overthrown, and they will take all necessary means to hew their way through to this purpose. I know that the people whom I represent have united their destiny with the destiny of the Union, and will share its fortunes whatever betide it. I have not asked them, but I believe they will respond cheerfully to this measure. But whatever they may do, I shall strive to remove all obstacles from the increase of the Army.

I ask gentlemen who oppose this repeal why they desire to make it easy for citizens to escape from military duty. Is it a great hardship to serve one's country? Is it a disgraceful service? Will you, by your action here, say to the soldiers in the field, "This is a disreputable business; you have been deceived; you have been caught in the trap, and we will make no law to put anybody else in it?" Do not thus treat your soldiers in the field. They are proud of their voluntary service; and if there be one wish of the Army paramount to all others, one message more earnest than any other which they send back to you, it is that you will aid in filling up their battle-thinned ranks by a draft that will compel lukewarm citizens who prate against the war to go into the field. They ask that you will not expend large bounties in paying men of third-rate patriotism while they went with no other bounty than that love of country to which they gave their young lives a free offering, but that you will compel these eleventh-hour men to take their chances in the field beside them. Let us grant their request, and by a steady and persistent effort we shall in the end, be it near or remote, be it in one year or ten, crown the nation with victory and enduring peace.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 450, for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States, reported that the committee after full and free conference had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows: that the Senate recede from its three amendments to the bill.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 266, to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, reported that the committee had met, and after full and free conference had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

1. That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "consular" before the word "officers," so that the clause will read, "may apply to any officer of the United States duly authorized to act in the premises."

2. That the House of Representatives agree to the amendment of the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts to put into English that report of the conference committee, for I confess that I never can understand the report of a committee of conference.

Mr. ELIOT. I will state in reply to the gentleman from New York that the bill as now agreed to is precisely the same bill passed by the House the other day, with the exception of one word, that is the word "consular." There is a provision in the bill for the examination of goods before they come into the country, that they are to be examined by a consular officer of the United States. But there seemed to be some little question when the consul recently appointed may come into full official life, and it was thought better to leave out the word "consular," so that now any officer of the United States duly authorized for that purpose may do the work which had been assigned to the consular offices.

Mr. BROOKS. It is substantially the House bill?

Mr. ELIOT. Exactly.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill of the House (No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States.

Also, that the Senate have passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) to declare the construction of a joint resolution for the relief of W. B. Matchett, approved June 20, 1864.

Also, that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill of the Senate (No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate have passed a bill of the House (No. 554) to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane, by an exchange of land, without amendment.

Also, that the Senate have passed a joint resolution (S. No. 66) providing for adjustment of the accounts of Henry W. Diman.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. MALLORY. During the last Congress, when this subject was first introduced into this House, I availed myself of the opportunity to express somewhat at length my views upon it. Those views are now recorded in the Globe, and I hope the House will now pardon me for a moment if I refer to what I said on that occasion.

I took the ground then and I entertain the opinion now, that the very worst policy which this Government could adopt is the policy of attempting to enforce a conscription instead of calling for voluntary enlistments, and the result of your experiment proves the correctness of that opinion. About the time when I uttered that conviction, or a short time before, a distinguished member of the Senate of the United States, the chairman of the Military Committee of that body, had stated that volunteering was progressing so rapidly in the United States it must be stopped, and the Government did stop it.

At that time the policy of the Government was well known. It was a policy which my venerable colleague, at that time sitting here by my side, had expressed in a resolution known as the Crittenden resolution, which was almost unanimously adopted by this House in 1861, and upon which policy we all understood the Government was determined to live or die. It was upon that policy that volunteering was progressing so rapidly that the distinguished leader of the Military Committee in the Senate declared it must be stopped. And what was that policy? Was it that which was so significantly and forcibly pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Military Committee of this House, [Mr. SCHENCK], in the remarks which he submitted to this body this morning? Was it the cruel and bloody policy which he indorses, and in which he wants the Government to persevere against the people of the South? Was it the policy of despoiling the white people of the revolted States of every dollar they have on earth, reducing them to beggary and absolute want? Was it the policy of saying to that people, "We deny to you the right of self-government even if you lay down your arms and submit to the Constitution and laws of the United States; we strip you of everything you possess, we will deprive you of every privilege, of every right which freemen do and ought to hold sacred?" Was it the policy of exterminating or driving from their homes the entire white race of the South, and supplying its place with a free black race? Was that the policy? No, sir, it was one of conciliation and love. It was one tending to teach these people that this Government still regarded them as brethren, as men worthy of being free citizens of a free Government; it was a policy which required that degree of coercion necessary to cause them to yield obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, but which when that was accomplished was to be abandoned and conciliation and kindness practiced instead. It was a policy which accompanied the power of arms with the declaration made and reiterated that, "If you will lay down your arms and yield willing obedience as citizens to the Constitution and laws, you shall have every right you ever enjoyed under the Constitution of the United States and your own States as perfect and as intact as though you had never engaged in this rebellion."

Sir, I assert here that that was the policy proclaimed by the Government when the people of this nation rushed as one man to the rescue of our flag and the vindication of our Constitution and laws. Does any man deny that fact? It is history, sir; it cannot be denied; it cannot be evaded; it is truth. Yes, sir, it was when under that policy volunteers were pouring in to the Government in a steady stream in numbers so great that fears were entertained for the Treasury, that they were stopped, stopped that the Government might not be taxed to maintain more soldiers than it had need for. It was not long after that time that a set of factious Governors of northern States, after having, in conjunction with leading radical traitors, in vain urged and pressed the President to change this policy, met at Altoona, in the State of Pennsylvania, and informed the President that unless his policy was changed, unless the extermination of slavery was made the object and purpose of the war and not the restoration of the authority of the Constitution and laws over the rebellious States, that if slavery was not put in process of extirpation they would stop the war, that not one of their States would rally to the standard we had raised for the purpose of vindicating the Constitution and the laws. Then, as if by magic, the policy of the Government changed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH rose.

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot yield. I have but a short time to speak, and I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH proceeded to address the House, but was interrupted by cries of "Order!"

Mr. MALLORY. I claim my right to speak, and call the gentleman to order.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it was that meeting of factious Governors at Altoona, and the pressure they then brought to bear, and had previously with others brought to bear, on the President of the United States—who is weaker than a man ought to be who sits at the head of our Government and holds the reins of power in a nation like the United States—that caused him to abandon his original policy, which was successful, which was admirable, and to take up that other policy which has failed, and which gentlemen on the other side acknowledge to have failed.

Sir, the policy we are now acting on, that cruel and relentless policy, was the one substituted for that noble and Christian one upon which the Government had been proceeding. The policy upon which we are now acting is that policy which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] said must be persisted in, even if it lead to extermination, ruin, and everything that is horrible.

The other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] sung a very different song to-day from that which he gave us a few days ago when this subject was up. He declared boldly at that time that if this clause allowing commutation money was not stricken out of the bill you would cease to fill your armies, you would cease to have soldiers, that Grant would come to a deadlock at Petersburg and Sherman at Atlanta; and that if you determined upon this policy you might as well determine to give up the war and recognize the southern confederacy. That was his declaration then, but he has pondered the matter since and become more prudent. He now says that he believes it will not stop the war to insist on the commutation clause, but that it will go on more languidly than it is now progressing.

He uttered a declamatory tirade about the glory and power of this Union and the glory and power of England. He spoke of the struggle of England under an able ministry against Napoleon. He extolled the skill and valor of the leaders and statesmen of that little empire, in all of which I heartily concur. He spoke of the opposition then waged against that ministry under the lead of the great Fox; and triumphantly exclaimed, "You have no Foes on that side of the House!" Well, sir, is there a Pitt on his side of this House? Is there a Pitt in the presidential chair, or in the Cabinet? If there be a Pitt among you, where is he, and who is he? Is the gentleman who claims to represent the other side on this question the Pitt of this day and hour? During the whole time that contest was maintained in the British House of Commons that great leader never made such an admission as that gentleman made the other day upon this floor, that if a certain act was not passed just as he wanted it, the war would cease, and an inglorious peace be concluded. I go further, and say that that great leader never proposed such a scheme as that offered by the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to this House to-day.

Notwithstanding what the gentleman from Ohio has said on the subject, I assert that England during all the wars she has carried on down to the present time has never resorted to the practice of conscription. That was introduced by Napoleon. He was the inventor of the system. England never practiced it before, and never has since, and did not practice it for the purpose of filling up her armies which were exhausted by her wars with Napoleon.

Sir, I go further, and say that this system upon which this Government is now acting was never practiced by it before in its history. During the whole long struggle of the revolutionary war, when the powers of three million people were taxed to their utmost to resist the power of twenty millions, when Britain was throwing her legions upon our shores to compel the submission of her colonies, the Congress never resorted to conscription for the purpose of filling up the armies. There were drafts in some of the States to a limited extent, it was a draft of the militia of those States, but the power was never asserted by the Congress, even under the plea of a military necessity, or because it was "indispensable to save the nation," during the whole of that war, to conscript its citizens and force them to become soldiers in the Army.

That power was never exercised during the war of 1812 by the General Government. It was then denied that it existed under the Constitution of the United States at all; it was acknowledged to exist in the States. They drafted from their militia and furnished to the Government of the United States the soldiers so drafted; but when that was done they were commanded by officers commissioned by the Governors of the several States.

I admit that in the Constitution power is given to Congress to call into the service the militia of the several States; but when that is done the Constitution expressly reserves to the Governors of the several States the right to officer the militia. In the war of 1812 the Government acted upon that principle and acknowledged it. An attempt was made during its continuance by the Federal Government to conscript or draft; but the effort, as gentlemen from the New England States know full well, was given up; and if my memory serves me correctly, it was done upon the remonstrance of leading statesmen of that region. Mason of New Hampshire was a violent opponent of the scheme. It was reserved to this day, for this Congress, for this Administration, as I have charged, to resort to that system of raising armies, and that, too, not long after the leader of the Government in the Senate, the chairman of its Committee on Military Affairs, had announced that soldiers were volunteering and being enlisted so rapidly that it must be stopped; and it was stopped. You abandoned a policy under the operation of which volunteer soldiers were obtained in such numbers that you had to stop them and resorted to another and entirely antagonistic one, under which volunteering ceased, your armies rapidly diminished, and to replenish them you resorted to forced levies.

Well, sir, how have you fared since? You have changed your conscription act of the last Congress to one less mild passed early this session, and now propose by this bill to make it still more rigorous; and are still in pressing need of more volunteers. I tell you you would not have need for so many soldiers at this time if you had not adopted the malignant policy now practiced by the Government, which has made the entire people of the South a unit in opposition to the Government of the United States and in support of the rebellion. Ay, it not only made the people of the South a unit in their determination to adhere to the rebellion and sever the Union, but it destroyed everything like unity of sentiment in the loyal States.

From that time you have had difficulties and dissensions. Up to that time men of all political parties and of every class united in a common effort to bring into the armies of the United States voluntarily as many soldiers as that Government indicated that it wanted. Since then you have found that interest flagging and falling back and back. The promise of the Governor of Massachusetts to the President that if he would utter the emancipation decree hundreds of thousands of men from the valleys and the hills of that State would rush to his standard, has not been realized. Those obtained from him have not rushed from the valleys and hills of Massachusetts, it is said, but have been procured by influences other than patriotic ones from other hills and valleys than those of that State, and in numbers not commensurate with the boastful promise of that high official. Numbers of negroes have been furnished by that old State in lieu of her white men, not "native and to the manner born," but enticed by bounties from other States that ought to be credited with them, while her white men have been carefully kept at home to pursue the more profitable and safe paths of commerce, and manufacture, and agriculture—a shift very creditable to the shrewdness and love of gain of the sons of the Bay State, whatever may be said of its honesty, patriotism, and bravery.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir, the gentleman must excuse me. I respectfully decline yielding to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have said nothing of a personal character.

Mr. Speaker, it is not by conscription that you are going to end this war. You will never do it. You have made the necessity of increasing your Army by this cruel and relentless policy you have proclaimed against the revolted States of the South; and now you turnaround and on the recommendation of the President and Secretary of War and the chairman of the Military Committee of this House propose to lay your hand upon the people of the loyal States as heavily and relentlessly as you have laid it upon the people of the rebel States. You seem to regard this, not as a Government of the people, but as something created by some power superior to the people and having rights over them which they have never conceded to it.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] went so far as to say that he would prosecute this war with fire and sword for thirty years if necessary, if every man had to yield up his life and every particle of his property to the United States to carry it on; and another gentleman backed him up by the declaration that the Government had a right to the life of every man and to every dollar, ay, to every cent which any one owned within the limits of the United States. I would like some able political economist to compute the value of a Government in human life. Is the Government as it exists to-day worth the lives of all its people? Is it worth the lives of half its population? When a war has been prosecuted to save a Government until the lives of all its citizens are lost who will be left to enjoy it; to whom will it be of value? I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that this Government is one created by the people and administered by officers sent here by them to carry it on for their own good; and the man who undertakes to tell the people of this country that they shall not control their Government, but shall be the victims and subjects of it, cannot stand before their just indignation.

Mr. Speaker, the iron hand of oppression, of cruelty, of deprivation of property and life to utter extermination, has been laid upon the South by your unconstitutional legislation, and the armies by which you are executing it. The same system of despotic oppression is now proposed boldly and openly by the member from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to be applied to the free and loyal citizens of the United States. He says to them, "You have no right to refuse to serve in the Army; we not only deny you the right so to refuse, but we require you to be willing slaves to the edicts and orders of this Government." The theory of the gentleman from Ohio is that this Government has a power of inherent and absolute authority, not derived from the people, but which sprang into existence by some hocus-pocus, some magic or miracle, and that it is authorized to tyrannize over the people and use them for every and any purpose which it may think proper. He seems to think that the great mass of our people were born with saddles on their backs, and the privileged few who administer the Government, booted and spurred, to ride them legitimately by the grace of God. I deny the theory. I will not argue against it; it is not worth an argument. The simple statement of it carries with it its refutation.

Sir, you cannot succeed on this theory. You are disposed to rule and control with a ruthless hand the people of the United States. You are disposed by this and other stringent tyrannical laws to deny them the right to exercise any discretion in the matter of serving in the Army. Every man conscripted must shoulder the musket and march. You change the willing volunteer, who carries an earnest spirit into the contest, for the forced conscript, who goes into it "like the whipped slave scourged to his dungeon." You have denied to the people's Representatives on this floor the right to indicate, even if it were necessary, their desire that the war shall stop and the southern confederacy be established. You want by this bill to deny them any right or choice to evade military service. The time may come soon, if this power is exercised without protest, without resistance, that the entire people of the country, almost without regard to age, will be levied en masse, and marched down to be hurled on those legions that have already destroyed so many precious lives. I tell you, sir, the day of reckoning is approaching. I warn that side of the House that on the ides of November the people will rise in their majesty and right and say to every public servant here who has refused to acknowledge this as their Government, created for their benefit, "Depart from us. We never knew you." The people will hurl you from positions of trust which you have abused. They will hurl from power the Administration in whose hands you want to perpetuate it, and put in its place men who appreciate the Government and understand the rights of its free citizens.

Mr. Speaker, another cause of the necessity for this conscription, of the reluctance of the free citizens of the United States to enter the Army, and of the necessity for this resort to absolute force to make them enter the Army, arises from a persistent effort made by the party on that side of the House and by the Administration to raise the negroes of the country to a level with white men; the negro soldiers to equality with the white soldiers, and even to a superiority over them. I do not believe that the free white soldier of the land will be satisfied that you, in the plenitude of your power and might over all the citizens of the United States, bond and free, shall place alongside of him, with equal rations, and equal pay, and equal privileges, and equal dignities, the sable son of Africa, with all his essential attributes. I charge that that is the effort which this party and this Administration have engaged in, to elevate the negro. And I charge that since the time that system was commenced you have obtained scarcely any volunteers. That, perhaps, is the reason why the promise of the distinguished Governor of Massachusetts, that if the emancipation and negro equality policy were adopted the citizens of Massachusetts would march by thousands from every valley and hill-top, was not observed. I assert now that for every slave or negro you place in the Army of the United States you have lost the services of at least ten white volunteers. What an exchange! The compelled, reluctant, stupid negro for the willing, free, intelligent white man!

Now, I feel that the service of the white man is equal to that of the negro. I believe that the white man is the equal of the negro. I do not believe that we can afford to lose a white man for every negro enlisted in the Army of the United States. How can you afford to make the exchange? In this contest victory has not always perched on your standard when you presented your best and bravest, because willing, white men to the opposing forces of the enemy. Do you increase your chances of success when you substitute the reluctant, compelled conscript for the volunteer? Do you not lose all chance when you supplant the white man with the negro, without his courage and without his intelligence? You have not only decided on this change and enlisted the negro, and by so doing diminished the ardor of the white man to engage in his country's service, but you have changed and deepened that reluctance into disgust by the persistent effort of the Administration for months past by every means in its power, not only to blazon the deeds of the negro soldier and assert his equality with the white in all that makes the soldier admirable, but to elevate him above the white soldier in all soldierly qualities. I protest against this in the name of the free white, patriotic soldier. I protest against this insult to the manhood and history of the white race. The Administration has exhibited this partiality in favor of the black race in a manner most marked and disgraceful.

When the Army was sent into Virginia under Grant, to take possession of Richmond, and to destroy the army of General Lee, which was to be done in so summary a way, there was attached to Burnside's corps a large number of negroes. You all remember their triumphal march through this city, and the plaudits showered upon them by the radicals, with the President at their head. Burnside did not use them in battle. He kept them behind him to guard the camp, to take care of the baggage trains, and to fill other subordinate positions of that sort. He did not believe them quite as good as the white soldier, not so brave, not so efficient as soldiers; he curbed their ardor, and held them back.

Grant moved from the Wilderness to Chancellorsville, after long-continued and bloody fighting, in which thousands of our brave white soldiers sealed their devotion to their country with their blood, and thousands were brought back to Washington to languish under painful wounds. We looked and listened in vain for some news of the daring of our sable soldiers. He fought despeately at Spottsylvania Court-House, on the North Anna, at the Chickahominy. Still the question was asked in vain, what have the negroes done? Grant knew their true value, and placed no confidence in them where cool courage and skillful maneuvering were required, and kept them back. Butler, it is true, from below Richmond, sounded their praises occasionally, but these blasts from his bugle-horn were few and far between, and of course nobody believed him. Grant had crossed the James, and still no glory won by the black cohorts. Petersburg was attacked; and the first bulletins of our operations before that city contained the long-desired laudations of the negro soldiers, and caused the hearts of the abolitionist, negro-loving miscegenators to bound with joy. The negro had at last been put in front; he had at last been allowed an opportunity to exhibit the great qualities that were in him, and vindicate his claim to be regarded the model soldier of the present age. The black soldiers had been led to the assault of the first line of redoubts and trenches in front of Petersburg, and driven the enemy from them, and occupied them after deeds of courage and skill that would hand down their names to immortality. The dispatches were transmitted by the Secretary of War to the Speaker of this House, and read by the Clerk, amid scenes of disorderly applause and cheering by the other side.

Time passed, and gradually the truth of history was vindicated. It turned out that these terrible defenses that were represented as so strong and formidable, and defended by the rebels with desperate valor, were occupied only by pickets, or at least by a mere handful of men, who did not defend them, but retired and left them after a mere show of resistance to be taken possession of by the negro soldiers. We have waited and looked in vain for the terrible list of killed and wounded in this desperate fighting. The authorities give us nothing on this point; proof positive that they have nothing to give. If casualties had occurred, as they would have occurred if any such fighting had taken place, the long list of the sable patriots killed and wounded would have been spread by Stanton over the whole country, and the War Department and White House perhaps been draped in mourning. The only report we have is from some newspaper correspondent. He makes the killed one, the wounded twenty. But these laudatory dispatches sent by the Secretary of War to this House and to Dix in New York were not the dispatches of Grant. I defy the Administration to produce his name to any such dispatches. His love of truth and appreciation of the true value of the white and black race preclude the idea that he could be made the agent to elevate the black at the expense of the white soldier. This thing had to be done; the Administration had determined on it; and as the commander-in-chief could not be used, some dirty tool had to be selected to do the dirty work, and among the numbers of that sort who cumber the offices under this Administration one was readily found to do it for the dog's pay. He was sent to the army at Petersburg to make up these dispatches, and he did it; such is my theory of this matter.

Well, sir, we had another exhibition of this prurient desire on the part of the Administration, as well as on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House, to aggrandize the negro and to parade his brilliant achievements before the world as being not only equal but superior to those of the white soldiers, in connection with the invasion of my own State by John Morgan. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] rose in his place a few days since and had a dispatch which had been handed to him read by a gentleman from New York, showing how bravely and gloriously some black patriots had behaved during the attempt of John Morgan to take the city of Frankfort; how with their fists and pocket-knives—being unarmed—they had retaken a gun which had been captured by the rebels. Sir, that dispatch was sent by some person in Kentucky, whose name I have not been able to ascertain, some person in Kentucky employed perhaps by the War Department to do such dirty work, some man who, regardless of truth, undertook to accomplish a particular purpose. He telegraphs the Secretary of War that these negroes in the fortifications at Frankfort having no arms rushed upon the soldiers of John Morgan, drove them back, and recaptured this gun. That dispatch was sent to Secretary Stanton, who, when he had received it, immediately transmitted it to my colleague from the Covington district, [Mr. SMITH,] who handed it to the gentleman from Maine, by him it was handed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORRIS,] and read suddenly to the House as evidence of negro prowess and negro bravery. Gentlemen on the other side of the House clapped their hands, and shouted out, "What do you say to that, MALLORY?" "Will not you withdraw your slanders of the negro now?" I was satisfied at the time that there was no truth in it, and I now assert that the whole thing from beginning to end was an absolute fabrication. I have before me an authentic denial of it in a letter I have just received this morning from the Governor of Kentucky. He speaks of the gallantry of the defense of Frankfort against Morgan's men, and speaks of the improvised soldiers as having behaved with a courage that would have become veterans of a hundred battle-fields, and adds, "They were all white." He says further:

"The negroes we had employed in constructing rifle-pits and redoubts very precipitately fled, in great confusion, at the commencement of the assault. General Lindsey and myself, having just reached the ground, had some difficulty in arresting their headlong flight, and so soon as they could be reduced to order they were sent away under cover of the hill to town."

They not only did not behave with any gallantry, but they shrank and fled at the first discharge of rebel musketry, and were sent back under the cover of a hill to Frankfort. And I tell you, sir, when we come to find out the whole truth in relation to these black soldiers at Petersburg we shall find that they distinguished themselves as highly and in somewhat the same way as did those negroes at Frankfort.

My friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who seems to be listening so attentively, lived in Kentucky once, and knows the negro and his attributes, and he knows, if he will tell you what he knows, that they won't fight.

Mr. BLAINE. From a residence of five years in Kentucky I came to the conclusion from what I saw of the negroes that there was a great deal of fight in them.

Mr. MALLORY. Was the gentleman ever attacked by them?

Mr. BLAINE. And if the gentleman has ever resided a little further south than Kentucky, on the larger plantations of Louisiana and Mississippi, I would ask him if the perfect terror of those regions is not a runaway negro hid in the cane-brakes?

Mr. MALLORY. Well, sir, he would do for a bugaboo to frighten negro children and white children into propriety.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I know it to be a fact. The gentleman from Kentucky will acquit me of having had anything to do with getting up that dispatch to which he has alluded.

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I have entire faith—and if I had not I would never vote a dollar of appropriation for these negro troops—that well-trained and disciplined negroes will make good troops. I do not believe they will make as good troops as white men, and I do not value any white man's opinion who does think so. But I have one fact which I desire to state. Some three weeks ago I had a conversation with Mr. Charles Hale, of Boston, who has just set sail for Egypt as consul of the United States to that country, and where a year or two ago he spent some time. I asked him what was the connection between Egypt and the Sublime Porte. He said the Sublime Porte only exercised a sovereignty so that when Turkey was engaged in war she could call upon Egypt for a contingent of troops; that she did that the last time during the Crimean war, and that Egypt furnished fifteen regiments of negroes of pure blood, unmixed from the foundation of the world, and as good troops as ever marched upon European soil.

Mr. COX. They were Abyssinians. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. They were Abyssinians whom my friend from Ohio found to be so surpassingly grand in their ecclesiastical attainments, and they are equally grand in their military attainments.

Mr. MALLORY. I will resume the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment more. Those negroes, I am reminded here, were not Abyssin-ians. The Abyssinians are a race of a religious turn, but these were Nubians—naked black Nubians.

But enough of that. Now I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he believes that a thousand white men of the Kentucky race—and I believe that no more gallant race than Kentuckians ever lived—unarmed and undrilled would have stood any better before the rebel musketry than the negroes themselves did.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, Mr. Speaker, that is another question altogether.

Mr. BLAINE. I will tell you what I believe.

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot yield. I will tell the gentleman what I believe. I believe that if there had been nobody but white soldiers in the case no dispatch would have been sent; but that anything whatever—although it might bear upon its face the evidence of its own falsity—is now seized upon to parade before the House and have it go to the country to show that the bravery and gallantry of the negro is superior to that of the white soldier. I acquit the gentleman from Maine of any such opinion and any such purpose.

In relation to these soldiers furnished the sultan by the Pacha of Egypt, let me say that they are an entirely different race from the blacks we have in this country. If they were Egyptians, they belong to a race which for thousands of years have had among them men and women distinguished for intellect and beauty. The Ptolemies and the dusky mistress of Antony, Cleopatra, that woman of loveliness and fascination, belonged to that race. If they were Nubians, they belong to a race with a great history, and are far superior to the Congo and other tribes further down in Africa from which our negroes sprang. History is a blank with regard to them. So much for the statement of the gentleman about the Egyptian troops furnished the sultan during the Crimean war.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy the attention of the House for so long a time when I rose. I have been drawn into discussion of matters I did not design to refer to; I rose merely to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee, for the reason that it is presented as a substitute, as an entirety. If for no other reason, I would oppose it on that ground. We cannot divide the question; we cannot take one part and reject another; the House is compelled to act upon it as a whole and to adopt it or reject it as a whole. It will not, therefore, receive my support, and I certainly hope the House will not adopt it.

Sir, if we are to have a conscription bill, if we are to have a bill under which the Government may lay its hands ruthlessly upon every white man of a lawful age in the United States, let us have one which we can examine in detail. Let us have one which we can take up clause by clause and suggest such amendments as may seem to us desirable to perfect the measure. Do not let us be compelled to accept as a whole a measure which its distinguished author presents to the House and says must be crammed down our throats without change or modification. Let us reject it. That is my voice. I have serious objections to a part of it, but it is impossible to consider it in detail now, for it has not been printed or read by the members of the House. As I gather from the reading of it by the Clerk, a portion of it authorizes the authorities of the States to go into the rebel States where our armies have progressed and procure soldiers by enlistment, black men as well as white men, to be credited to the quotas of the States so subsidizing and enlisting them; in other words, the black men enlisted in Louisiana by Massachusetts agents are to be credited to the quota which Massachusetts will owe to the Government. I understand that to be a provision of this bill. I protest against it.

Sir, if these men are to be brought into the Army from the rebel States, if we are to take white men and black men from those States and put them into our Army, let them be accredited to the Government of the United States. Let them be recruited as United States forces, let them be recruited by United States officers, and not incite States in the North who do not furnish the requisite number of men from their own citizens to send their agents down there and make up their quotas in that way. Sir, this provision of this substitute, notwithstanding the exclusion of the commutation clause, may catch the votes of the New England men, who want the Army filled and strengthened, but not by their men. The States of the North, where capital is concentrated, may agree to this bill by which the rebel States can be subsidized by them; but the western States, where the money cannot be raised to procure these subsidies from the South, from Louisiana and Arkansas, will never consent that the blood of their free white men shall be mingled on your battle-fields with that of the negro of the South, bought with New England money.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] made a most singular, and I must be permitted to say a most inconsistent declaration when he asserted "that the people of his State and of all the loyal States were far in advance of the Government in zeal and anxiety to put down the rebellion, and are for more energetic means for its suppression than the Administration and Congress are willing to adopt." I understand him to claim that they are eager for the fray, consumed by a burning desire to enter the Army, to see that Army powerful and effective, and therefore he wishes to pass this bill to force them into the Army, and denying them the privilege of commuting their service with money. Sir, are they denied the privilege of volunteering by existing laws? No, sir; yet he argues as though they were. They want, says he, to enter the Army, have the privilege to do so, and are enticed to do so by large bounties, yet do not do it; and the gentleman to-day proposes to force these willing men into the Army with an iron hand. Have this Government and its supporters got to love the cruel exercise of power for its own sake, even when no object is to be secured by it? Has the habit of command bred a preference for enforced to willing service? It would seem so. It would seem that, maddened by the exercise of power as the tiger is by the taste of blood, they must feed their appetite for destruction by the annihilation of all constitutional guarantees, all law, all State governments, and all private right. May God arrest them in their mad career!

Mr. SCHENCK. Instead of occupying our time in trying to amend the bill we are running into a general debate. I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. The bill then will not be subject to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. STEVENS. Before the gentleman does that I desire to present an amendment which I will offer if the previous question be voted down. I do not think we shall have a vote on this bill to-night, and I will therefore ask that my amendment be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I have also an amendment which I design to offer and would like to have printed.

Mr. ELIOT. I, too, have an amendment in reference to which I make the same request.

The several amendments were by unanimous consent ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has not the previous question been demanded?

The SPEAKER. It has; but these amendments have been presented on the hypothesis that the previous question will not be sustained.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I now present the report of the committee of conference upon the internal revenue bill, and I desire to state that after the report has been read, if any gentleman requires any explanation of any part of it, I shall be happy to answer any question, and then I propose to call the previous question.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 405) "to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 114, 12, 53, 73, 199, 201, 288, 295, 301, 340, 374, 376, 377, 382, 405, 419, 427, 429, 430, 461, 472, 492, 500, 506, 512, 519, 535, 537, 539, 581, 582, 611, 613, 615, 617, 619, 635, and 637.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, numbered, 1, 34, 5, 10, 11, 15, 45, 46, 534, 57, 61, 64, 65, 66, 70, 71, 76, 77, 78, 80, 81, 83, 103, 153, 155, 156, 157, 159, 200, 203, 227, 232, 291, 295, 331, 347, 364, 365, 386, 387, 388, 389, 370, 371, 372, 373, 389, 390, 391, 392, 397, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 407, 408, 410, 412, 415, 416, 418, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 431, 432, 435, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 4524, 454, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 462, 4674, 468, 469, 470, 473, 4734, 474, 493, 498, 499, 507, 508, 509, 525, 526, 527, 528, 541, 564, 571, 573, 574, 575, 591, 597, 598, 603, 604, 605, 607, 608, 609, 612, 614, 616, 618, 620, 624, 625, 627, 628, 629, 631, and 634.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their third amendment and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: strike out the words inserted by said Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "and;" and the House agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment or the House to their eighth amendment, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all of said amendment of the House, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the cashier of internal duties, who shall hereafter be called cashier of internal revenue, and whose annual salary shall be $2,500, shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall give a bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Solicitor, that he will faithfully account for all the moneys or other articles of value belonging to the United States which may come into his hands, and perform all the duties enjoined upon his office according to law and regulations, as aforesaid; which bond shall be deposited with the First Comptroller of the Treasury;" and the House agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their thirty-eighth amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their fifty-eighth amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their sixty-seventh amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their one hundred and fifth amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their one hundred and seventeenth amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their one hundred and twenty-second amendment, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the one hundred and sixty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their one hundred and ninety-second amendment, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their six hundred and twenty-sixth amendment, and agree to the same with the following amendment: before their said six hundred and twenty-sixth amendment insert the following:

And provided further, That whenever the duty imposed by any existing law shall cease in consequence of any limitation therein contained, before the respective provisions of this act shall take effect, the same duty shall be, and is hereby, continued until such provisions of this act shall take effect. And when any act is hereby repealed, no duty imposed thereby shall be held to cease in consequence of such repeal until the respective corresponding provisions of this act shall take effect: And provided further, That all manufactures and productions on which a duty was imposed by either of the acts repealed by this act, which shall be in the possession of the manufacturer or producer, or of his agent or agents, on the day when this act takes effect, the duty imposed by any such former act not having been paid, shall be held and deemed to have been manufactured or produced after said date; and whenever by the terms of this act a duty is imposed upon any articles, goods, wares, or merchandise, manufactured or produced, upon which no duty was imposed by either of said former acts, it shall apply to such as were manufactured or produced, and not removed from the place of manufacture or production prior to the day when this act takes effect.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following: Insert in lieu of the words stricken out by said Senate amendment the words:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to pay over daily to the Treasurer of the United States all public moneys which may come into his possession, for which the Treasurer shall give proper receipts and keep a faithful account; and at the end of each month the said Commissioner shall render true and faithful accounts of all public moneys received or paid out, or paid to the Treasurer of the United States, exhibiting proper vouchers therefor, and the same shall be received and examined by the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, who shall thereafter certify the balance, if any, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the First Comptroller for his decision thereon; and the said Commissioner, when such accounts are settled as herein provided for, shall transmit a copy thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller, or either of them, the inspection of moneys in his hands, and shall, prior to the entering upon the duties of his office, execute a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the First Comptroller, in a sum of not less than $100,000, payable to the United States, conditioned that said Commissioner shall faithfully perform the duties of his office according to law, and shall justly and faithfully account for and pay over to the United States, in obedience to law and in compliance with the order or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, all public moneys which may come into his hands or possession, and for the safe-keeping and faithful account of all stamps, adhesive stamps, or vellum, parchment, or paper bearing a stamp denoting any duty thereon; which bond shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And such Commissioner shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase his official bond as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendment: add at the end of said Senate amendment the words, "and the President is hereby authorized to alter the respective collection districts provided for in said section as the public interest may require."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the thirteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendment: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words "who shall be a resident of the district of said assessor."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the fifty-seventh and a half amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: after the word "Government" in said Senate amendment strike out the words "of the United States."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments: in line twelve of said Senate amendment strike out "two" and insert "one;" in the fifteenth line of said Senate amendment strike out "two" and insert "one;" and in the seventeenth line of said Senate amendment strike out "fourth" and insert "fifth."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-first and a half amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: transpose said Senate amendment to come in at the end of the words "per annum," in the thirtieth line, on page 25 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in line forty-five, page 26, strike out the last letter in "affidavits," strike out the words "of his" and the letter "s" in "clerks;" in line forty-eight, same page, strike out the letter "n" in "nor;" in line forty-nine strike out "n" in "nor," and after "in" insert "any;" in line fifty, same page, strike out "n" in "nor."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from the word "and" where it occurs the second time in line seven down to the word "one" where it occurs the second time in line eight, inclusive, and the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-ninth amendment of the Senate with the following amendments: strike out all from the word "except" in the twenty-fifth line, page 39, down to the word "act" in the twenty-seventh line, page 31, inclusive; and after the word "for," in the twenty-ninth line, page 31, insert "rent, stationery, blank-books, and postage, and pay of."

W. P. FESSENDEN,

T. O. HOWE,

P. G. VAN WINKLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JUSTIN S. MORRILL,

GEORGE H. PENDLETON,

S. HOOPER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps the most important subjects connected with this bill, in the estimation of the House, are the taxes upon beer, liquors, and tobacco. The committee of conference agreed that the tax on ale and beer should remain at $1 a barrel, and that the tax on liquor should be $1 50 a gallon from and after the 1st of July to the 1st of February, 1865, and after that $2 per gallon.

In relation to newspapers we retain the provision of the old law that those having a circulation of less than two thousand shall not be taxed on advertisements.

We have agreed to the Senate's amendment taxing passports $5 each.

The income tax we have arranged so that all incomes exceeding $500 up to $5,000 shall be taxed 5 per cent.; between $5,000 and $10,000, 7½ per cent., and above $10,000 10 per cent.

The tax in relation to banks has been so amended as to be precisely the same as that upon the national banks; that is to say, 1 per cent. on the average circulation, ½ of 1 per cent. on capital, and ½ of 1 per cent. on deposits. In addition to this 2 per cent. or 3 per cent. as a whole is placed upon any excess of circulation over 90 per cent. of capital, or over any average circulation which existed in the six months prior to July 1, 1865.

Mr. DRIGGS. What has been done with the Senate amendment with regard to salt?

Mr. MORRILL. The matter in which I suppose the gentleman from Michigan is interested is in the tariff bill, and not in this bill. So far as this bill is concerned the tax remains as it was when the bill passed the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to know what disposition has been made of the seventy-fourth and seventy-ninth amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. The House recedes from its disagreement to the seventy-fourth amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is in reference to the salaries of collectors?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. How about the seventy-ninth amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. That is agreed to, with an amendment reducing the amount to not over $4,000, and the percentage of commissions on some of the largest amounts was reduced half of one per cent.

Mr. GANSON. I understand that there is a tax upon the gross receipts of vessels and canal boats of 2½ per cent. I would ask if it is in order to have a separate vote upon the different clauses of the report.

Mr. MORRILL. That amendment, I have been informed, was introduced by a Senator, for whom I have great respect, from the gentleman's own State, and after discussion was adopted by a large vote in the Senate, and the conferees on the part of the Senate were unwilling to yield the point. My own opinion is that the tolls paid might very well be deducted from the gross receipts.

Mr. GANSON. I ask again whether it would be in order to have a separate vote on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. It would not; the report of a committee of conference must be voted upon as a whole.

A MEMBER. Will the gentleman from Vermont state what is recommended in regard to the matter of cigars, and particularly as to inspections?

The SPEAKER. The House recedes from that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. In regard to the tenth section, a considerable number of alterations were made. The clause requiring manufacturers of tobacco to have it inspected and to have each package labeled has been struck out. In relation to the other amendment a permit will be required from all cigar makers; but they will not be required to go to the assessor every month with a statement and deliver it to him under oath. They will be required, however, to keep an account of the cigars they manufacture which may be called for whenever the assessor may deem it necessary.

Mr. KERNAN. I would inquire what has been done with the amendment adopted by the Senate in regard to savings banks that have no capital and pay no profit except to depositors.

Mr. MORRILL. These we exempt from taxation.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to make a suggestion in reference to the tax on railroad companies. That tax is imposed on the gross receipts without deducting the running expenses. Now, according to the report of the State engineer of New York, the running expenses of the railroads of that State average a little over sixty-six per cent. of the gross receipts, leaving less than thirty-four per cent. for dividends to stockholders and to pay interest on the debt. The payment of a tax of five per cent. on the gross receipts will leave but little to be paid to the stockholders. I know of one road in the State of New York and of many roads in other States that never can divide one cent under this system of taxation. I think it unjust.

Mr. ODELL. I would like to ask what disposition is made of the section providing for the sale of stamps?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senate amendment is rejected and that of the House adopted, leaving the matter as it is now; or so that collectors, postmasters, stationers, or any other persons may keep them for sale.

Mr. ODELL. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MORRILL. Stamps will be distributed as heretofore all over the country in the hands of postmasters and other officers of the internal revenue.

Mr. ODELL. That is all right.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the previous question on the report of the conference committee.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the report was adopted; there being, on a division—ayes 101, nays 6.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes on House bill No. 450; also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (No. 66) providing for adjustment of the accounts of Henry W. Diman, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and an act (H. R. No. 554) to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane by an exchange of land.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the conscription bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, if this matter goes over till Monday, is it likely to be overridden by some other special order?

The SPEAKER. The House can give it precedence by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that by unanimous consent a vote shall be taken on this commutation matter at one o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask in regard to the business before the House whether, if we should dispose of the tariff bill to-day and of the enrollment bill on Monday, there would be any difficulty whatever in closing this session on Thursday next.

Mr. STEVENS. So far as the Committee of Ways and Means is concerned we have disposed of all the business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have been informed by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate that, with this question disposed of, there will be no difficulty in Congress adjourning on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Whatever proposition the gentleman wants stated to the House the Chair will state.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that a vote shall be taken on Monday next at one o'clock on the conscription bill and the various amendments to it.

Mr. DAWSON. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. COX moved that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 78, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William A. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffin, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hohman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Mallory, Marey, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Proyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Bonwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gaudin, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wilson; and Window—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Baily, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Henry Winter Davis, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Frank, Ganson, Grinnell, Hall, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Kuhlfeisch, Kasson, King, Knapp, Long, McAllister, McBride, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Perry, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—47.

So the House refused to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

During the vote, Mr. FARNSWORTH stated that his colleagues, Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. J. C. ALLEN, were paired on this question.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS. If we refuse to order the main question, would that leave the bill and amendments under the operation of the previous question?

Mr. SPEAKER. It would not. Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope it will be voted down.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, nays 63.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Mr. BLAINE. If the main question is ordered, does it not exhaust itself on the amendments?

The SPEAKER. It does not. Mr. BLAINE. Then I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. COX. What time will it be in order for me to move that the further consideration of this question shall be postponed until the next session?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading of the bill if the gentleman from Ohio does not demand the previous question on its passage.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and B. Wood were appointed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, nays 74.

So the House refused to order the main question to be now put.

Mr. SCHENCK. The previous question was seconded. Now, what is the effect of refusing to order the main question?

The SPEAKER. The 132d rule provides:

"Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed as though no motion for the previous question had been made."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not seek to debate the details or special merits of this bill. I have sought the floor to discharge a duty to my State, which I supposed I would have had an opportunity to do through the courtesy of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY]; and I was taken by surprise when I found that the gentleman from Kentucky deemed it necessary to the argument he was making to arraign the State of Massachusetts, and then thought it necessary to that argument to refuse to a Massachusetts Representative upon this floor an opportunity to make a simple statement of the facts of the case. I am confident that on reflection the gentleman from Kentucky will regret that unusual lack of courtesy on his part.

Although Massachusetts has been frequently before the House committee, members I dare say are very tired of it, yet they will bear the members from Massachusetts witness that they have never brought her forward, but have only stood in her defense. They have no disposition to indulge in any boasting of their State. They do not believe she has done any more than her duty, and it may be far from all that history and impartial judgment in the future will have exacted of her. They have not been disposed when others have seen fit in the discharge of their duty to arraign Massachusetts before the House to remain silent; and hence more frequently than desirable has her name been brought into debate here.

On a former occasion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] charged that she refused to supply her full share of troops under the several calls of the President. He charged that she was in deficit twenty-one thousand troops. The gentleman from Kentucky has to-day renewed in substance that charge, and though not fixing any particular deficit in numbers, has denounced her for that peculiar policy to which Massachusetts has always been attached in regard to colored soldiers, assigning that among other reasons for the deficit he claims and which he refused me an opportunity to refute. Whenever I shall find it necessary, and I hope I never shall in any argument I have to make here, to arraign Kentucky upon this floor, I trust it will not also be necessary to my argument to refuse to any Representative upon this floor from Kentucky to set her right. I only desire with a simple statement of figures to put Massachusetts right upon the record, and to show by actual figures not only that she is not in deficit but in surplus.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman alludes to me personally. I made no allusion to the gentleman personally in my speech. If I had done so I should have felt bound to yield to him whenever he asked me. As he has made allusion to my remarks he will do me the favor to allow me to correct him.

Mr. DAWES. I know that the gentleman did not allude to me personally; but is it less discourteous to slander my State upon this floor and then refuse me an opportunity to reply?

Mr. MALLORY. I never slandered the State of Massachusetts. I spoke of her present Governor. Of Massachusetts as a sovereign State I never spoke at all in my remarks.

Mr. DAWES. I am upon the floor simply to show that Massachusetts is not behindhand in supplying her quota. The Governor of Massachusetts needs no defense from me at this time. If he ever does need such defense I shall not be slow to give it. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio on a former occasion, and of the gentleman from Kentucky to-day is that because Massachusetts has adhered to a particular policy in reference to the enlistment of colored troops, she has failed to do her own duty, and in that they are mistaken. I do not boast of how much she has done. I am ready to say that Massachusetts, so long as she has a life or a dollar to offer, has not done all of her duty if that be required of her.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a statement, an account current between the Government and Massachusetts bearing date June 4, 1864, and signed by F. N. Clarke, major fifth artillery, Acting Assistant Provost Marshal General. The exact call on each congressional district, with the deficits and surpluses in each, is as follows:

Tabular statement showing the quotas, credits, deficiencies, and surplus in each district, State of Massachusetts.

District.	Quota.	Credits.	Deficiencies.	Surplus.
No. 1	3,451	3,231	425	205
No. 2	3,457	3,339	162	44
No. 3	5,148	4,968	452	272
No. 4	5,046	4,714	630	298
No. 5	3,307	3,504	83	280
No. 6	3,445	3,367	173	95
No. 7	3,231	3,389	51	209
No. 8	3,722	3,733	122	133
No. 9	3,499	3,229	409	139
No. 10	3,864	3,098	784	18

Official: F. N. CLARKE,
Major Fifth Artillery, A. A. P. M. G.
June 4, 1864.

This statement makes our deficit fifteen hundred and ninety-eight, not twenty-one thousand as charged upon us.

But I have also from the Provost Marshal General, Brigadier General Fry, a statement under his own hand dated June 4, 1864, in which he charges Massachusetts with 934 less than his assessment. This reduces the deficit at once to 664. I have also the statement of Major Vincent of returns not included in this account current between the 1st day of April and the last day of May: of three years' enlistments, 2,423; enlistments in the regular Army, 291; making 2,714. This changes at once the deficit into a surplus of 2,050. But this, again, does not include the recruits in the reserve corps enlistments during that same time, or any of the naval enlistments, or any enlistments of colored troops since April 1. They are estimated by the Governor of Massachusetts at 3,000. So that I show under the hand of the officials here an actual surplus of 2,050, and if we include the others who have not been counted, it will make a surplus of over 5,000. I annex a statement showing this surplus:

Tabular statement of Major Clarke, Acting Assistant Provost Marshal General, June 4, 1864, showing a deficiency of.....	1,598
But he charges us.....	38,170
General Fry charges us.....	37,336
	934

Deficiency.....	664
Three years' volunteers from April 1, to May 31, 1864, (Major Vincent's return,).....	2,423
Enlistments in regular Army same time.....	291
	2,714

Surplus June 1, 1864.....	2,050
To which should be added reserve corps enlistments since May 1, naval enlistments since same time, and enlistments of colored troops since April 15, 1864, estimated at.....	3,000

Actual surplus.....	5,050
---------------------	-------

We have not done any more.

Mr. COX. What proportion were enlisted in Massachusetts? What proportion were colored men? How many were enlisted in Maryland? How many in Ohio? How many in Canada? How many in this city where there is now an agency for the purpose of recruiting men for Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. I have just now stated that this did not include any colored troops since the 1st day of April. Before that time we had enlisted no great number of colored troops, except our fifty-fourth regiment, which has won laurels of which even an Ohio regiment might be proud.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My chief purpose in desiring to obtain the floor is to state to the House the reasons by which I have been controlled thus far in refusing to vote for the proposition to repeal the commutation clause of the enrollment act. In the first place, I have given the vote in deference to what I suppose to be the public sentiment of the country. I understand that substantially—not exactly, perhaps—but substantially the calls for troops by the President have been met. I thought, to be sure, from the observations of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] made this morning, that he supposed that because the Representatives on this floor from Massachusetts had refused to support the repeal of the commutation clause as recommended by the Military Committee, they were prepared to indorse the observation which that gentleman made on the previous day when this subject was under discussion; an observation which I thought unfortunate; an observation which I thought calculated to alarm the country; an observation which I thought calculated to give strength, courage, and confidence to its enemies; an observation which, if my memory served me, to the very last words and the very last letter used, I would not repeat here or elsewhere, even in the way of quotation. And to-day I thought when he was referring to Massachusetts that he supposed, inasmuch as we took the responsibility of differing from the judgment of the Military Committee, that therefore we were prepared to abandon this war, to sacrifice the country, and to involve it in irretrievable ruin. If it was his intention to suggest to the House and the country that Massachusetts or a man of hers who has a right to speak on her behalf here or elsewhere had come to any such conclusion, then he misunderstood if he did not intentionally misrepresent that State.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do the gentleman's remarks apply to me?

Mr. BOUTWELL. To no other man upon this floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say that I have made no reference whatever to Massachusetts; have never in my life intimated by any word I have uttered that Massachusetts was derelict of duty, for if I love any State in the Union better than my own it is Massachusetts, and I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not do me the wrong of intimating that I intentionally or unintentionally said anything upon this floor disrespectful to that State. What I said in my closing remarks before the House when this subject was last up, and which have been referred to this morning and criticised, I believe to be true. The same thing has been declared in higher places than mine, and we have got to meet it. It is courageous to meet it, and cowardly not to meet it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I judge no man, but I was able to connect the observations made upon one occasion with those made upon another. The gentleman recollects the remark made the previous day, which was an expression of his opinion of the effect of a certain vote given, in which vote the delegation from Massachusetts participated; and I recollect that to-day he called the special attention of this House and of the country to the previous history of Massachusetts and to her conscription act of 1693. I may have erred in the inference to be drawn from those remarks, and if I have so erred I have done injustice to the gentleman; if not, the remark I made is but just.

Now, sir, the position of Massachusetts as I understand it is this: she does not desire a rigid conscription either of her own citizens or of the people of the country, so long as this war can be prosecuted vigorously and with reasonable hope of success by other means. What we say and what we present to the House and the country is the great fact that thus far we have substantially complied with the requisitions of the President for men and money. If there has been no failure under such circumstances as to indicate, as a consequence of that failure, our inability to prosecute the war, then we ought not to inaugurate a policy which gives offense even to one man. Not merely should we hesitate to inaugurate the policy proposed in deference to opinion upon this side of the House, but we are bound to consider the sentiments even of those who differ with us upon matters of public policy, but who are in favor of prosecuting the war. When the country is no longer able to carry on the war without a rigid conscription we shall not hesitate to accept the necessity as the means of restoring the Union and preserving the national life. But at the same time I say here, what I have already said to many of my constituents—and it is a declaration by which I mean to be bound so long as I have a voice either as a citizen or a Representative—that nothing in men, or money, or means, shall be withheld from the Government; all shall be yielded according to the necessity existing.

Sir, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had read the whole history of Massachusetts he would have known that in the Indian war of 1675 and 1676, we sacrificed one twentieth of our inhabitants, and that every twentieth building in the colonies of New Plymouth and Massachusetts was laid in ashes. Be it ever remembered that that war ended without a treaty of peace. It is the only war on this continent that was ever brought to a conclusion without such a treaty. The children of the men who made these sacrifices for the defense of their homes will make equal sacrifices for the defense of the nationality of this country; looking to a termination of this war when there shall be no treaty of peace. When I say there shall be no treaty of peace I do not wish to be understood that this is a war of extermination either of the blacks or whites. I believe that only one thing is necessary on the part of the southern people, and that is that they shall abandon the institution of slavery. When they shall have laid down their arms and abandoned that institution, which, as I believe, was the source and is the support of this war, then we shall yield to them their positions in this Union, accord to them all their local and State rights, and maintain their position and rights in this Union as we maintain our own. But, sir, until this war is ended there can be no compromise, no arrangement, no treaty.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to despair at all of the Republic, or of the power of the Government to maintain itself. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] said this morning that the whole policy of the country was changed by the proclamation of the President, and he attributed that proclamation to the meeting of the Governors of certain States at Altoona. I am not here to be put upon the witness-stand, but it so happens that I have the means of knowing that the proclamation of September, 1862, was entirely independent of and antecedent to the meeting of the Governors at Altoona. The meeting of the Governors had no connection with the proclamation. The gentleman from Kentucky should remember that prior to the issuing of that proclamation we had met with but few successes, and that we had endured many, many reverses. Lee had battled for four days under the fortifications of the capital, and had finally crossed the Potomac into Maryland. It was not until the country put itself on the side of justice that it had a right to expect the favor of Divine Providence, or any of those successes which have rendered this war glorious in the cause of freedom, truth, and justice.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman state when that convention of Governors assembled at Altoona?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think it assembled at Altoona previous to the 22d of September, but I assert as within my own knowledge that the issuing of the proclamation was determined upon previous to the meeting at Altoona.

Mr. MALLORY. Can the gentleman inform me when the issuing of that proclamation was determined upon?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot go far in this matter. I assert distinctly the fact which is within my own knowledge that the President previous to the meeting of the Governors at Altoona had decided in a certain contingency, which happened upon the Wednesday preceding the 22d of September, to issue the proclamation, and therefore the inference I draw is in contravention of the declaration of the gentleman from Kentucky that that proclamation was the result of the meeting of the Governors at Altoona.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman tell us the contingency on the happening of which that proclamation was to be issued?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I said, Mr. Speaker, when I mentioned this fact, that I was not to be put upon the stand as a witness. I have made a statement as of a fact within my own knowledge, and history will confirm the statement.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts does not wish to answer the question or to state the fact I will not insist.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have done nothing more than this—to put my statement of a fact, which I assert to be within my own knowledge, against the declaration of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the proclamation of emancipation, or the monitory proclamation of emancipation, was issued in consequence of the meeting of Governors at Altoona.

Mr. MALLORY. We know that the President himself stated on the 13th of that month that he had no idea of issuing such a proclamation, and that he argued against issuing it. I want to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it was between the 13th and 22d, and if so, at what point between these two periods, the President had prepared the proclamation and had determined to issue it upon a certain contingency. I would also like to know what that contingency was.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman from Kentucky is good at questioning, but I have to keep myself within the position which I stated.

Mr. DAWES. Courtesy is an exchangeable commodity.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I trust I shall lose nothing by my courtesy.

Mr. MALLORY. Of course not. I decline to ask any more questions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman from Kentucky has made some observations in disparagement of negro troops. I have entertained the opinion in relation to this whole question of emancipating the negroes and putting them into the service of the Government, that it was a legitimate means of diminishing the power of the enemy and of augmenting our own. I have never thought it necessary to inquire how far the loss of a negro slave diminished the power of the rebels to carry on this war. I dare say the gentleman from Kentucky has been called upon seriously to contemplate that question. I have only felt that in some degree, I cannot say how great, it diminished the power of the rebels to carry on the war. Therefore, I said to myself, dismissing entirely the question of justice and humanity, if you please, that it is perfectly within the policy of the Government to emancipate the slaves as a means of diminishing the power of the rebels. When the question arose as to using the emancipated negro in the service of the country, I said to myself, it is not possible that a negro who has contributed to the support of the South should be unable to do something for the enlargement of the powers and for the augmentation of the resources of this Government.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 23, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 206.

consent of the Chair this business of interruption is at an end.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly I will not persist in my interruptions if not agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTWELL. To gentlemen on that side of the House, and especially to the gentleman from Kentucky, and those who have been engaged with him in this hopeless struggle to perpetuate the institution of slavery, I submit for their consideration in this hour of their grief that we have not only had the preliminary proclamation of September, 1862, but also the great charter of liberty upon this continent, the proclamation of 1863; and whether there be peace or whether there be war, whether there be victory or whether there be defeat, whether there be union or disunion, that decree is eternal for this continent; and the gentlemen from Kentucky who still hope to resuscitate the institution of slavery, whether they give a timid and uncertain support to patriots struggling for the preservation of the Union, or whether they attempt to withhold from the Government the physical and moral power of the slave element upon this continent, are still doomed to disappointment, and to disgrace, permit me to say, without personal reference to any man. It will stand upon the page of history as a foul blot that the fairest portion of the North American continent, that Kentucky, blessed with a soil rich and a climate inviting, a State of all the States which should have buckled on the armor, and with the ancient warlike energy of her people rallied to the support of the Government in the hour of its trial, that she, I say, deliberately bowed the knee to slavery and rendered the issue of the contest for a time uncertain. Devastation has already wasted her land, and she will yet be an object of pity to the people of this continent and of the world. And I now offer my sympathy in anticipation of the inglorious future which awaits that State, if her present policy be pursued, tendered with some hope that she may—

Mr. MALLORY. We scorn and despise your sympathy. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BOUTWELL. With the hope that she may yet redeem her honor.

Mr. MALLORY made some remark amid tumultuous cries of "Order!"

Mr. BOUTWELL. But I anathematize her no longer. Kentucky has already upon this floor some men true to liberty, and if my voice could pass beyond these walls and reach those other sons of hers misguided, unfortunate, but not yet lost to the Constitution and the Union, I would invite them, in common with the people of this country, to abandon the institution of slavery, to rally to the support of the Union and the Constitution, and thus help to make this continent the home of the free, where there shall be neither slave nor master any more.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a moment?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not reply to the miserable tirade uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the spirit in which it was uttered. I would be acting in a manner unbecoming this House and myself if I were to do so. The only fitting answer is that elicited from a man's heart by the first impulse of feeling under such an infliction as we have had from that member in the shape of abuse of my State, and an impudent expression of pity for her.

It well becomes him, a member now of this House, to denounce the institution of slavery, and to speak of God's smiles and God's blessing on those engaged in an attempt to extirpate it, in the full blaze of the fact that as a Democrat before he became an apostate, he was one of the most violent pro-slavery men in the State of Massachusetts, and abused without stint his former abolition allies; a man who, while acting as Governor of his State, as I am informed, agreed to surrender fugitive slaves to those infamous scoundrels, their masters, as he now terms them, in the slave States.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. That is not so.

Mr. MALLORY. That is the previous history of the apostate of Massachusetts, but he has sold himself since to the enemies of slavery, as he chooses to call them now. And now he gets up in the face of this history of his in connection with it and denounces slavery as one of the blackest crimes, and stigmatizes the owners of slaves, those who have owned them heretofore, and who own them now, as sinners, as scoundrels, as miscreants, and everything abominable.

Sir, I have always heard that "one renegade was worse than ten Turks," and I find it true in the case of the member from Massachusetts. He, a renegade pro-slavery Democrat, is more denunciatory now of slavery and slaveholders than any of the old-time, true-bred abolitionists on the other side of the House.

Mr. A. MYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. I object to the gentleman from Kentucky being interrupted.

Mr. MALLORY. Pennsylvania is not involved in this controversy at all, and I have the floor only by the permission of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I object to any interruption. We have had insults enough from that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] objects to any yielding of the floor, the gentleman from Kentucky cannot proceed, because the gentleman from New York has yielded to him.

Mr. COX. In that case I withdraw the objection. The Chair knows that I never meant that.

Mr. MALLORY. I have but a word or two more to say in the time allowed me by the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] charges me and other members from Kentucky with whom I act with being engaged in a covert effort to thwart the Government and fetter it in its action. He happens to be engaged in the same effort that we are, and all the reproach that he heaps upon our head falls upon his own. We are opposed to striking out the commutation clause of the conscription bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts is opposing the same thing, and he is doing it in the face of the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] one of the military leaders of the House, and the confidential exponent of the views of the Administration, that if we strike out that clause we paralyze the arm of the Government, stop the war, and eventually acknowledge the southern confederacy. The gentleman has placed himself in this dilemma, and there I leave him.

Mr. GARFIELD. I recollect that in the introduction to one of Cooper's novels he speaks of having opened a magazine which criticised him about certain matters, and then he opened another magazine that praised him for the very same thing, and he said that he felt like a donkey between two loads of hay and did not know which he should eat. But he finally concluded that he felt like a load of hay between two donkeys. I do not make the application to any gentleman here personally, but that expresses my own feelings on this occasion. I am charged on the one hand of having said unwise and unjust things, and with having attacked the State of Massachusetts, which I never have attacked.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is entitled to the floor, and if he yields to the gentleman from Ohio he must yield to others.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is any objection, certainly I will not proceed.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, if this discussion had been confined to the immediate question before the House I should not have participated in it.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from New York yield to a motion to adjourn? [Loud cries of "Oh, no!" from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have but a few words to say, and shall detain the House but ten or fifteen minutes. I repeat that had this discussion been confined to the immediate question under consideration I should not have prolonged this debate at all, because, however other gentlemen may view it, in my opinion it does not involve very serious considerations or principles as some gentlemen seem to suppose.

The law as it now stands exempts by commutation or substitution. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs proposes to abolish the commutation and leave substitution only. Practically, in my judgment, it amounts to very little. I do not think so far as the condition of the country is concerned and the grave questions which are now forcing themselves upon the American people that it matters much how you may amend the conscription law, what modifications you may make in it, what reforms you may attempt in it. The principle of conscription is anti-republican and anti-American. When you resort to force to fill your ranks you violate the fundamental principles upon which the Government is founded; when you resort to coercion or bribery by bounty to fill your armies it is not necessary to predict the result against a foe whose cause, in their own judgment, whether right or wrong, involves their lives, their liberties, and their property. Armies raised by such methods cannot successfully subjugate a foe thus marshaled in arms against it.

So far as the conclusion of this war is concerned, I do not care what system of finance you may adopt, I care not how you attempt to patch up the present rotten policy of the Government either in its military or its financial department, the die is cast and your war is a failure. Expedients or subterfuges cannot avoid the catastrophe. It has been my practice in life to meet every question like a man, to meet it face to face, and to call things by their right names. When the Almighty designs to circumvent the wrong objects of man He has His own way for accomplishing His inscrutable purposes. When He decreed that the tower of Babel should not approach the heavens He sent a confusion of tongues, as He has sent a confusion of tongues and of ideas and of policies among the advocates of the war in this House; and in these differences, in these discussions, in this confusion and conflict of ideas and of designs and of propositions I see a hope for my country. "Those whom the gods seek to destroy they first make mad."

Now, sir, I repeat I care little whether this proposition be adopted or not. I care not whether you pass a bill for an additional loan of $400,000,000, or of $1,000,000,000. I care not whether you pass your gold bills or other bills having for their object an avoidance of the impending calamity. I care not under what policies you prosecute the war; it is wrong in its objects, destructive in its tendencies, and must fail of restoring the Union. The way to restore this Union has not yet been adopted or attempted by the Government or by the party in power. Until some Administration of the American Government adopts a policy of reconciliation and of concession, and returns to the principles on which our Government was founded and on which the institutions of the country were erected, the Union cannot be restored. If the war continues we shall adopt one expedient to another in the down-hill course to destruction and national disintegration.

Mr. WARD. Will my colleague yield to me? Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. No, sir. I say, Mr. Speaker, that until we return to the paths of peace; until the olive-branch is extended; until an attempt at reconstruction by the civil, not the military department, is attempted, you cannot and you should not accomplish your purpose.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in opening the debate to-day, said that there was but one way of success, and that that was coercion. He advocated this proposition solely on the ground of the necessity of filling our armies to continue in this bloody crusade against our own countrymen. All of the speeches made in behalf of this proposition had that one idea, that one object in view. That was the avowed design. Sir, I am for restoring this Union. I would lay down my life and the lives of all my posterity, so far as I have power over them, to restore this Union, and it is because I am in favor of the Union that I am opposed to war. War is disunion, disintegration, annihilation, and destruction. It has been repeated so often, until honest men have come to believe it, that there is no other way than coercion; that we are now in for the war and must prosecute it; that it is cowardice to retract; that any man who speaks of peace is called a traitor or an unconditional submissionist; and the idea is scoffed at that those States now in rebellion against the Federal Government can be induced to return to their allegiance except by being whipped into submission.

Sir, "the whipping will not be done." We have already expended more blood and treasure in the three years this war has been in existence than it can accumulate for such a purpose in the next twenty-five years. The fact that you are resorting to measures of this character shows that the people are against the war. Why is it that you compel men to fight if the war is popular?

Sir, it requires no argument, no elucidation to show that when republics are compelled to resort to force to obtain men and adopt coercive measures to create armies, whether the cause be right or wrong, whether it be patriotic or unpatriotic, so far as popular opinion is concerned it has ceased to commend itself to the popular support and popular approval.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to take this occasion to say that, in my opinion, all the States of this Union, all the States upon the American continent, can once more be gathered under one common Government, established by our fathers, without the firing of another cannon or the shedding of another drop of blood. I propose to prove this assertion. At the commencement of this war, the demand of the confederate States was for recognition and nothing else. Their demand was that their independence as a nation should be recognized. They held to that position firmly, determinedly, and fought for it. I think there has been a modification of this position. It appears to me that a union may be effected on a constitutional basis. I propose now to read a very brief extract from the address issued in February last by the confederate congress, and ask the House to bear in mind that this address passed unanimously—every senator and every member of the house of representatives at Richmond signed it. That address, after recapitulating the history of the war from its commencement down to the present time, presents their ultimatum to the people of the United States; and what is it?

"Until some evidence is given of a change of policy on the part of the Government, and some assurance is received that efforts at negotiation will not be spurned, the congress are of opinion that any direct overtures for peace would compromise our self-respect, be fruitless of good, and interpreted by the enemy as an indication of weakness. We can only repeat the desire of the people for peace, and our readiness to accept terms consistent with the honor and integrity and independence of the States, and compatible with the safety of our domestic institutions."

Sir, the independence of the States is a Democratic doctrine. Any man who reads and studies the history and theory of this Government from the Declaration of Independence down to the present time will find that the independence of the States was guaranteed in the Constitution by the framers of the Constitution, and has been a principle of the Government recognized ever since the adoption of the Constitution, so that when the southern confederacy decides that they are willing to make peace whenever the United States grant them terms consistent with their honor, consistent with the safety of their domestic institutions, and consistent with the independence of the States, I hold that it is the duty of every man who loves the country to extend to the people of the South the right hand of fellowship, and let them come back into the Union upon terms of that conciliatory and constitutional character.

Governor Brown, of Georgia, in his message of March last, says:

"In view of these difficulties, it may be asked, when and how is this war to terminate? It is impossible to say when it may terminate; but it is easy to say how it will end. We do not seek to conquer the northern people, and if we are true to ourselves they can never conquer us. We do not seek to take from them the right of self-government, or to govern them without their consent." And they have not force enough to govern us without our consent, or to deprive us of the right to govern ourselves. The blood of hundreds of thousands may yet be spilt, and the war will not still be terminated by force of arms. Negotiation will finally terminate it. The pen of the statesman, more potent than the sword of the warrior, must do what the latter has failed to do.

"But I may be asked how negotiations are to commence, when President Lincoln refuses to receive commissioners sent by us, and his Congress resolves to hear no proposition for peace? I reply, that in my opinion it is our duty to keep it always before the northern people and the civilized world, that we are ready to negotiate for peace whenever the people and Government of the northern States are prepared to recognize the great fundamental principles of the Declaration of Independence, maintained by our common ancestry—the right of all self-government and the sovereignty of the States."

"Let it be repeated again and again to the northern people that all we ask is that they recognize the great principle upon which their own Government rests—the sovereignty of the States; and let our own people hold our own government to a strict account for every encroachment upon this vital principle. Herein lies the simple solution of all these troubles."

Gentlemen will also remember that in May last resolutions were also introduced into the confederate congress proposing to appoint commissioners to treat with the Government of the United States for reunion upon the basis of the Constitution. Among other resolutions the following was then proposed:

"Resolved by the congress of the confederate States, That the delegates from each State, acting in its sovereign and independent character, for the purpose of adding moral to our physical force, and placing ourselves properly before the civilized world, do most earnestly appeal to the president, by and with the advice of the senate, to appoint commissioners whose duty it shall be to propose an armistice of ninety days to the proper authorities of the Federal Government, preliminary to negotiation upon State sovereignty and independence; and the said commissioners shall report in writing to the president the answer received from the Federal Government upon the subject."

Therefore I repeat, Mr. Speaker, and I defy contradiction, that the southern States are ready to negotiate for reconciliation, and in my judgment no party can succeed in the coming presidential election, and that no party should succeed, that does not meet these propositions fairly and squarely.

Sir, the people are tired of this war. A brave, noble, generous people are not for continuing the war under the circumstances, with its terrible results, and carried on for conquest, and upon a policy utterly destructive, inhuman, and bloody. In my judgment the American people should pass upon this war in the November election. Had I the power I would have but two candidates before the people, one for war and the other for armistice, negotiation, reconstruction, and reunion. I would be willing to stake all that is mine in the present and future that the peace candidate would succeed by an overwhelming majority.

The time is rapidly approaching when a reaction will take place which will not only sweep war men from power but will make them so obnoxious that the men who compose this Administration will flee the country for protection. I go further, and strike deeper than your amendment to the conscription law. Sir, that is but an incident. It is a matter of trifling importance compared to the greater question, when shall this bloody crusade cease? When shall these marshaling hosts lay down the sword and return to the honest, legitimate avocations of peace, to union, fraternity, and prosperity? When shall this excitement be followed by sober second thought? Not until we suppress this war spirit and put out of power those who pursue a policy utterly wrong, utterly anti-American, utterly anti-Christian, utterly anti-humane, and antagonistic to all of the principles of republican government.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to have participated at all in this debate, but believing this was a fitting occasion to present these views I sought the floor. They are my individual opinions, for which my party must not be held responsible. On this question I stand independent of party. While I am thus independent I will not become the victim of any party in withholding opinions entertained, and which involve the life, liberty, and unity of my country.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will make another proposition to the House. It has never been my desire to prevent gentlemen offering amendments to perfect the original bill; but I do want to close this general debate. I propose that we shall proceed with the consideration of the bill by unanimous consent, each gentleman offering his amendment to perfect the original bill, which is open to amendment, and that we limit ourselves to the five minutes' discussion. That will afford every opportunity to members on both sides of the House.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to know from the gentleman from Ohio, who has charge of this bill, whether he proposes to have this debate go on interminably, or to call for the previous question?

Mr. SCHENCK. My desire from the beginning was that a fair opportunity should be afforded to gentlemen on both sides of the House to debate the bill and to offer amendments before the vote was taken on the substitute. For that purpose I proposed we should fix an hour on Monday when we should proceed to vote. That was objected to. I found we were drifting into a general debate on politics, and I called for the previous question. The previous question was seconded, but the House refused to order the main question to be put. I have made another proposition which has also been objected to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why not have a vote on the bill at the present time? The gentleman from Ohio seems to have given up the control of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I decline to call for the previous question so soon after it has been voted down.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. This is a question of vital importance to every man's constituents, and there are a number of gentlemen who desire to be heard on it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to know when the House will come to a vote on this question. [Cries of "Now!" "Now!"]

Mr. STROUSE. Is it in order to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the gentleman from Illinois is upon the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] appeals to me, and I yield the floor to him for a few moments upon the condition that when he is through he will demand the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. I will return the floor to my friend after a few moments.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the gentleman renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to any bargaining.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I yield the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. I would not detain the House at all except that I differ from my colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] who said he did not care what this House did in reference to the subject under consideration. I do. I feel a deep interest in our legislation, and I care much in reference to everything which is done here affecting the welfare of our constituents and of the country.

It is a misfortune that in civil wars, in times of public calamity and disorder such as exists in our country, men of extreme views on the one side and the other obtain too much control. In the excitement and passions which prevail, conservative and moderate men seem to have no influence in connection with public affairs. Thus it has been in other countries, and this now appears to be the case in our own. While we are surrounded by calamities so great that thoughtful men stand almost paralyzed with apprehension as to what will happen next to the country, extreme men on one side or the other really shape public policy and control as to public measures. I do not think that it is well that such men should have their way. I believe that if they do, on the one side or the other, we shall go down in ruin as surely as events pass on. On the one side are men like my colleague, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who stand up here under the circumstances which surround us and tell us there ought not to be another gun fired, that we can have peace and union without it. Oh! sir, if he could only show us that there is the least reasonable chance of restoring this Union and preserving this Government without any further bloodshed every man who loves this country should strive to do that which he says can be done.

Sir, it seems to me that we are deceiving ourselves and others when, under existing circumstances, we say that we can now have the Union and peace without firing another gun. To cry peace and an abandonment of the war in my judgment at this time means an acquiescence in the independence of the southern confederacy and a dissolution of the Union. I can understand that amid carnage, amid blood, amid sorrows and sufferings such as exist among our people, if a man can make himself believed as an advocate of a practicable peace, he would have great weight. But I ask my colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] how we can have peace to-day with a restoration of the Union? Where will you withdraw your armies to? What will you do with Kentucky, the majority of whose people have stood for this Union under trials such as we have never endured? Will you withdraw your armies and leave to the mercies of the secession leaders every man in the border States who has dared to stand up for the flag and endeavored to perpetuate the union of the States under the Constitution? Are you prepared to leave to extermination those who trusted in our good faith and power to maintain the old Government? Will you allow them, with their families, to be driven as outcasts into our northern States? In my judgment peace is attainable now only by agreeing to separation and abandoning the Union men of the border States to these calamities.

Where is the proposition for peace based upon the perpetuity of the Union which has ever been rejected by our people? There has been no proposition for peace by those in rebellion that was not based upon the idea of a destruction of the Union which our fathers gave us, and which they charged us to maintain and hand down to our children, if we would be faithful to liberty and free government.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I merely desire to answer the question of my colleague.

Mr. KERNAN. I have no objection to my colleague asking me any question.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do not propose to ask him any question. I want only to answer the question he propounded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the floor being yielded, and under the rule which has just been read it can only be yielded for explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire only to say upon my responsibility as a member of this House that there have been three efforts for peace made which have been rejected by this Government.

Mr. KERNAN. One of those efforts I suppose was the one made before Fort Sumter was fired upon; and at that time my colleague from New York city was one of the strongest advocates for putting down the rebellion. It was popular then, and my colleague helped to raise the great Mozart regiment to aid in putting down this rebellion.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I stated in the presence of my colleague that I aided to raise that regiment which was intended to protect the capital and not to invade the southern States, and that gentleman knows it well enough, and he has no right to repeat here statements about me which he has heard me deny on this floor, and which he cannot prove.

Mr. KERNAN. I know that in 1861 and 1862, when the popular current in the State of New York was in favor of raising men to protect this capital and to defend and perpetuate the Constitution and the Union, my colleague was not the man to raise his voice against it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I denounced the war in 1861 and 1862 as strongly as I do now.

Mr. KERNAN. I was a member of the Democratic State convention in New York in 1861. The politicians with whom my colleague was connected and acted came to that convention and were not admitted. That convention passed resolutions denouncing secession and declaring that they were in favor of employing the necessary force to suppress the rebellion. They further declared that conciliation should be added to force to bring the southern people back to obedience to the Constitution, and, by what was known as their ninth resolution, they protested against the unconstitutional measures of the Administration, against its arbitrary arrests, against the suspension of the habeas corpus, and against martial law in States where no insurrection existed.

The gentleman's political friends went home; they denounced us for embarrassing the Administration in the prosecution of the war; they then went for the Union ticket, and the Democracy were beaten.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I would like to know what is the subject-matter now under consideration by the House.

The SPEAKER. The conscription bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the Speaker whether the debate to which we have been listening for the last twenty minutes is pertinent to the subject before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is. This bill is one to raise troops to carry on the war for the Union, and this debate seems to be relevant to that.

Mr. KERNAN. It is suggested to me by those who know better than I do, that this Mozart regiment, which my colleague says was sent to defend this capital, was a regiment for three years or the war. My colleague [Mr. ODELL] is my authority, and I appeal to him to substantiate this statement.

Mr. ODELL. The statement made by my colleague is exactly true. [Applause.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the raising of a regiment in New York has nothing to do with the measure now pending. [Laughter.]

Mr. ODELL. This regiment to which I refer was raised under the auspices of the "Union Defense Committee," of which I believe my colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] was a member; at any rate he acted in entire harmony with that committee in sending troops to the war.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The mayor of the city was the member. [Laughter.]

Mr. ODELL. Yes, sir, the mayor of the city.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Member ex officio, by virtue of his office.

Mr. ODELL. One word further, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of my colleague, [Mr. KERNAN,] on this subject. Tammany Hall promptly came forward in its patriotism and devotion to the country to raise a regiment of soldiers to support the Government. Mozart Hall, under the patronage and auspices of my friend from the New York district, could not consent to be behind in that work, and asked permission through the honorable gentleman to raise a regiment also; and my friend from New York is the man who did the work, and in the canvass of 1862, when he and I were elected to our seats in this body, I remember that he came out in a card in the papers and said that he had raised that regiment at an expenditure to himself personally of over six thousand dollars. [Laughter.] And here let me say a braver regiment, a more gallant set of men never left home to defend their country than that same Mozart regiment. It has written its name historically on almost every battle-field in which the brave army of the Potomac has fought; it has been under a constant baptism of fire and blood. The remnant of it has, I believe, reenlisted, and the day before yesterday the colonel of that regiment, Colonel Egan, as gallant a man as ever drew a sword, was brought into this city and is now in a dangerous condition. These are the men whom my colleague claimed to have sent forth to fight for and defend the institutions of the country, and I am astonished, amazed, sir, that he should rise in his place to-day and say that the regiment came here to defend the capital and to serve within the confines of the fortifications of this city.

It is not so, sir. They enlisted for the war; they were mustered in for three years or the war, and they enlisted to go wherever the authorities of the country should send them, and they have been sent up and down the Peninsula. Their fortunes have been linked as warriors with their comrades of the Potomac army. They fought at Yorktown, at Williamsburg, at Antietam, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, and now again in the Wilderness; and to their eternal honor be it said, their fighting at Cold Harbor was of that character that they lost twenty-two line officers and some three hundred men, and their dead have been buried upon those fields side by side with those of the brave men from my own district who belong to the same brigade and division. They there sleep the sleep that knows no waking. I know all about them, sir, and I should be sorry, indeed I would, sir, had I been instrumental as my colleague has been in sending them to the war, to forego for political reasons the credit of doing so. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that no man in this House is more responsible for sending men to this war than my colleague from New York is. [Laughter.] Why, sir, on the 20th of May, 1861, I was present and on the platform with him, when at Union square, New York city, he exhorted and urged men to go by thousands to the foot of Canal street, in the city of New York, and there to embark for the war. At that time he was mayor of the city, as such was in position of great power, and he having great personal influence in addition, both were without reserve thrown upon the side of the Union to the gathered thousands attendant at that memorable meeting. Now, sir, my colleague closed his speech by saying—

"My friends, it has been already announced by the chairman of this meeting that the steamer Baltic and other vessels at the foot of Canal street are ready to take five thousand men to-morrow to the capital at Washington. I urge a hearty response to that call that New York may speak trumpet-tongued to the people of the South."

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this does not look much like only defending the capital. The people of the South, to whom my colleague wanted them to speak, were not around the capital but "in regions beyond." If I, like him, had held the position and had exerted his power and influence to send so many men forth to fight the battles of the country, I would not, as he does to-day upon this floor, repudiate them; no, never, never. I would, sir, rather as a patriot and lover of my country cherish fondly the memory of the dead, and stand for the defense and support of the living. [Laughter and applause on the floor.]

Mr. KERNAN resumed the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope my colleague will allow me the opportunity of replying.

Mr. KERNAN. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, were it true, as is alleged by my colleague, [Mr. ODELL,] that I deserved all of this praise for having raised such a noble regiment, which has lost so many men and spilled so much blood in this war, may the Almighty forgive me for the sin and error I have committed. [Hisses on the floor.] Now, sir, briefly, candidly, clearly, and deliberately, I desire to repeat in a very few words what I have said on previous occasions in this House in reference to this question. In the spring of 1861, at the breaking out of this war, when the Administration called for troops to protect the capital, when the rebel armies were within cannon range of the building in which we are seated, I did use whatever influence I possessed, whatever funds I could spare, and all the power I had to raise a regiment of soldiers—noble, true, Mozart Hall Democrats—to come down here to protect the capital. It is also true that after that regiment was raised, and when it was beyond my control, it was mustered into the service of the United States, and was prostituted to other purposes. Whether its enrollment was for three days or for three years was a subject over which I had no power, and for which it is not right to make me responsible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may or may not be true, and admitting it were true that at the commencement of this war, when the whole American people rallied as it were like one man for the protection of the Union, I did exert myself actively in raising troops, I can say with entire consistency that after the war has been diverted to another and wholly unconstitutional purpose, in which the men and money we have given have been used in a fruitless and unsuccessful contest for wicked and partisan purposes, I say it is entirely consistent with my present position when I now say that I am opposed to the continuation of a war which it has become apparent to the American people cannot and should not succeed.

Mr. KERNAN. I beg it to be understood that I have no desire to fix upon any gentleman the charge of inconsistency; but I do desire to call the attention of the House to one or two facts which will show that, however much we may desire peace, any man who says to-day that there should not be another gun fired must be willing to acquiesce in the dissolution of the Union of the States, and to negotiate a peace upon that basis. In my judgment this result can be averted now only by employing adequate force to overcome those in armed rebellion against the authority of the United States Government, and at the same time adopting a policy of moderation and conciliation toward the people of the rebellious States which will tend to bring them back to the Union. I admit that mere force of arms cannot restore and preserve the Union; it will not be desirable if it is to be held together only by bayonets; I admit that notwithstanding all the armed power we may exert, disunion, with all its consequent disasters, may come by pursuing a false and unconstitutional policy as to the objects of the war, by permitting extreme fanatical men to push us into a position which we should not as a Government occupy; but I believe that no matter what party were to-day in power, we could not have peace with the Union preserved except by showing that we have power to put down armed resistance to its legitimate authority. Not that I believe or ever have believed that the great mass of the southern people, if satisfied that their rights under the Constitution are to be respected and secured to them, desire to destroy the Union; but, sir, I have believed and do believe that, in the language of their own vice president, Stephens, whom I call as a witness, ambitious men, who believed they could form a government in which they could rule supreme, have seized upon the power of those States, and have bound together the mass of the people against the Union by pointing to acts and declarations by portions of the people of the North which indicated that the people of the southern States were to be deprived of their constitutional rights. During this session speeches have been made in this Hall, resolves and laws passed, the tendency of which was to unite the people of the southern States as one man against the restoration of the Union and in favor of an independent confederacy.

Sir, disunion may be accomplished, but I for one mean at least to have the satisfaction of being able to say that I was one of those who resisted it by my voice, by my counsel, and by everything I could properly do. If this misfortune is to happen, whether it occurs soon or after several years, our people must go through a terrible ordeal. If they fail to maintain the union of the States there is no future for us but bankruptcy and anarchy, until, after years of suffering, some subsequent generation may build up wisely, as our fathers did, another Union, and, profiting by our misfortunes and follies, provide against the causes by which the old Union shall have been destroyed.

To secure any chance of preserving our present Government and of restoring the union of the States under the Constitution, I believe that we must have armies, not to exterminate, not to subjugate, not to desolate needlessly, but to make the Constitution and laws of the Union to be respected and submitted to. When this is done, I am one of those who are willing to say that we are ready to do everything which generosity and fraternal feelings could suggest toward the people now in rebellion, but with whom we hope to live peacefully under the same Government, sitting together at the same council-table. This I believe to be the sentiment of the mass of the Democratic party.

Sir, I have said, and I repeat it, that there are extremists whose influence has been felt and is felt in the policy of this Administration, nay, who control it, and which policy if persisted in will, in my deliberate judgment, destroy all hope of restoring the Union. It is to be regretted that there are extreme men on each side of this House, and it is with earnestness, but with respect and kindness, that I appeal to reasonable men on both sides of the House to act with moderation; to adopt needlessly no harsh or extreme measure. Unlike my colleague from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] I take an interest in the law proposed to be enacted. I desire that it shall not be made needlessly oppressive; that it shall not be made more harsh or unbearable than is necessary. I hope that the reasonable men in this House will not permit extreme men on one side or the other to control the action of the House.

Do you believe these measures of confiscation, of extermination, these bloody resolves, and these harsh statutes which have been proposed, and some of which have been passed, can be enforced? Would we enforce them if we could? Do you not know that these measures and the wasting of the time of the national Legislature in discussing them tends to prevent the restoration of this Union and the bringing of these people back again to live under a common Government? Do they tend at all to preserve this Government? They do not. Since we met seven months ago the hearts of many of the true patriots of the land have grown sad from what has occurred here. One of your own party, a zealous party man, said to me on a recent occasion, when I visited my home, that with the dead and wounded lying around us in Washington, twenty or thirty thousand, how men could spend time here arguing about amending the Constitution, about repealing dead laws and statutes, excited his wonder and indignation; that it appeared to him that those intrusted with administering the Government occupied themselves with everything else than that which would do good to the cause of the Union, with measures which might do evil, might disturb and distract the North, which could not do good at this time, and that his heart failed him when he saw there was so strong a disposition to attend to everything else than the putting down of this rebellion and the restoration of peace.

I put it to every man's judgment, does he think that these measures do good? Sir, when this war broke out our people in the North were united. Why? Because it was said and believed throughout the land that it was not to be a war on our part of subjugation, that it was not to be a war of extermination, that it was not a war to compel the States to regulate their local affairs different from what they wanted themselves, but that it was a war for the defense of the Constitution and for maintaining the just authority of the Government under it. At that time, when the President called for seventy-five thousand men, more than one hundred and fifty thousand stepped forth. Again, in 1861 when he called for three hundred thousand men a response came at once from the people to more than the number asked. So it was in 1862. What does this prove? That we do not require harsh and coercive laws. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said in reference to raising men, that the Government should be able to lay its royal hand upon every man. Thank God we have no such Government in this country. We have no Government that can lay its royal hand upon the people. We have the Government of law, and every man should submit to the law.

When the war was prosecuted for the purposes and object I have alluded to, the people stepped forward freely. There was no want of soldiers. Do gentlemen believe that now we will not get men unless by a harshly coercive draft? I prefer reasonable laws. Appeal to the people to put down resistance to their own Government, a Government which they themselves have established, and which if maintained they are to maintain. I prefer to do that instead of making a law by which we command them as though they were our servants to step forth to the battle-field and fight our battles instead of their own.

I trust gentlemen will judge what should be the law from experience. In the State of New York we have raised and put into the field up to the 31st of December last, two hundred and sixty-three thousand and eighty-nine three years' men, and twenty-nine thousand militia, which were marched out for a short time. All the calls down to and including those of July and August, 1863, were filled up. In the spring of 1863, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, declared that we must put a stop to recruiting; that the volunteering system gave us more men than we wanted. They afterwards passed the conscription act, and what is the result? In New York we raised two hundred and seventy thousand three years' men by the volunteering system, without expense to the Government, and then with the conscription act, and an army of office-holders, and three months of effort in 1863 raised only nine thousand one hundred and seventy-six drafted men and substitutes. Does not this show we ought to make reasonable laws and appeal to the people to sustain their own Government?

I understand some insist that they would rather that the Union should be dissevered than that slavery should not be abolished. If the people of the North are to believe that this is not a war for the Union under the Constitution, not a war to put down the rebellion, but to carry out a moral idea in reference to the institutions of the States, you will need coercive laws indeed, and then you will not get soldiers. The people of the North will fight to maintain the Union made by them of the Revolution, but they will not wage war to impose their views as to local institutions on the people of any one of the States.

Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but for a few minutes longer—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yielded to the gentleman, supposing that he wanted the floor for a few minutes only.

Mr. KERNAN. Still, my friend would not expect me to define my position on the one side and not on the other. In my judgment we should leave the commutation clause as it is, and we should call upon the people, not in the spirit of coercion and power which is talked about so much, but in language like this: "This is your Government, and if defended and maintained you have got to do it; we have passed a law by which men are to be raised, and a portion of you are required to enter the service or find substitutes." Address the people in this spirit and you will find them in every town raising their quota and putting them into the field. But unduly stringent laws will not accomplish the object.

Mr. Speaker, I have been by various Democrats requested to say—and I believe it is true—that the suggestions I have made express the general views of most of the Democratic members of this House. We are in favor of putting down this rebellion and restoring the authority of the Constitution, and we are in favor of using all the force necessary to do it, superadding to force at all times conciliation. We are against waging a vindictive and exterminating war against any portion of our people. We would carry on this war which is forced upon us in the spirit in which a father would chastise and restrain a son to prevent him from accomplishing any wicked purpose toward the peace and integrity of the household, and who, after having made him desist and obey, would invite him again to become a member of a united and happy family with all his rights and privileges. While we would act in this spirit toward the mass of the people, we would punish the guilty leaders in this rebellion for their treason according to laws which they have wickedly violated.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic conservative party is in favor of peace, but it is a peace based upon the union of the States under the Constitution, not purchased by and based upon disunion. Such a peace would be obtained by ignoring the teachings of its founders, and all the traditions, instincts, and affections of those who constitute that party. The Democratic party has been ever faithful to the Union and opposed to secession and all the isms and agitations which endangered the perpetuity of that Union. In 1860 and 1861, when the danger of disunion was imminent, when men of extreme views North and South seemed to coöperate to produce it, the Democratic party and the conservative men of other parties who to-day act with the Democracy, strove to maintain peace and preserve the Union, to avert the civil war which now exists. And, sir, if that party shall again be intrusted with the administration of the Government they will strive to restore the Union, and I hope with success. They will exert the physical power of the Government and all the moral power of right, justice, and conciliation to restore and perpetuate union and peace.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish it understood that if the previous question is voted down as now demanded, I will move the previous question upon the pending amendments only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the Chair what would be the position of the bill before the House in that event?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is seconded, and the House adjourn, this bill will come up the first thing after reading the Journal on Monday; if not seconded, and the House adjourn, the Chair cannot state when it will come up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will modify my proposition, and call the previous question upon the pending amendments only.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at half past five o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, JUNE 27, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented five petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of the United States, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution as will expressly recognize the obligations of the Christian religion, and that slavery may be abolished throughout the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of John J. Anderson and John W. White, praying compensation for cotton used for fortification purposes in the city of Nashville, Tennessee, in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. BUCKALEW, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy, and Charles E. Flandrau be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 62) for the recognition of the free State government of the State of Arkansas, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER on the 27th of May, declaring that a State pretending to secede, and battling against the national Government to maintain that pretension, is not entitled to representation in the Senate until it has been readmitted into the Union by a vote of both Houses of Congress, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the credentials of William M. Fishback and of Elisha Baxter, claiming to have been elected Senators of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior in relation to reports made by a commission consisting of Messrs. Day, White, and Wattles, appointed in 1861, and communicating copies of all correspondence between those commissioners and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 510) further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, have directed me to report it back to the Senate. This bill relates to the line of steamers between New York and Aspinwall and the connecting line from Panama to San Francisco. The committee have received statements from the agents of those lines, but have received no information from those who favor the bill; but they believe it is a bill which should receive the consideration of the Senate; and if there is any light, it will come by their reporting favorably on it.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 73) to allow Senators and Representatives to visit forts, military prisons, and hospitals within their respective States, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. RIDDLE. I give notice that I shall contest that report.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print twenty thousand copies of the report on agriculture, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That twenty thousand copies of the report on agriculture be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "fifteen thousand," and after "Senate" to add "and seven thousand for the use of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing how that agrees with the number heretofore printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The number heretofore printed I believe has been twenty thousand for the use of the Senate and some for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture. The Commissioner of Agriculture did not obtain from the House of Representatives this year the number that he has usually had, and he desired, therefore, that the Senate should give him ten thousand copies. Upon consultation with the Committee on Agriculture, to whom the Committee on Printing thought this resolution more appropriately belonged, it has been reported with this amendment. The Department had twenty thousand last year, and this year it will have seventeen thousand according to our report. The Senate, I believe, had twenty thousand last year, and will now have fifteen thousand. We have cut down the number somewhat.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It was that to which I desired to call the attention of the chairman. I understand that this volume is much more valuable to the agriculturists of the country and much more interesting than any volume that has preceded it. I should like to have at least the usual number printed, that being the case.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Agriculture rather agreed with the Senator from Kansas; but in the midst of the general extravagance we thought there ought to be one economical committee, and we did not know any other committee to attend to it, and so the Committee on Printing have been very economical this session.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by putting in twenty thousand for the use of the Senate instead of fifteen thousand.

The question was put; and the amendment to the amendment was declared to be rejected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask for the yeas and nays. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator from Kansas had better allow the resolution to pass as it is, and he can move for the printing of an additional number when the Senate is fuller than it now is and take the sense of the body on the question.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Very well.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

FULL ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of War, in connection with the Army Register for the year 1864, to cause to be printed and published a full roster or roll of all field, line, and staff officers of volunteers who have been in the Army of the United States since the beginning of the present rebellion, showing whether they are yet in the service or have been discharged therefrom, and giving casualties and other explanations proper for such Register. To defray in whole or in part the expenses of this publication, an edition of fifty thousand copies of the enlarged Register is to be published and sold to officers, soldiers, or citizens, at a price which shall not more than cover the actual cost of paper, printing, and binding, and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing if this postpones the small edition of the Register until all this additional matter is printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMAN'S COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of War, communicating the reports of the American Freedman's Inquiry Commission, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That three thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of War, communicating the reports of the American Freedman's Inquiry Commission, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire what will be the expense of that publication.

Mr. ANTHONY. Between seven and eight hundred dollars.

Mr. COWAN. I am really constrained to say that I think this is going too far in the condition in which we are at present, to throw money away by the handful for the publication of papers that nobody supposes will ever do the country any good whatever. It may be well enough and proper enough in time of peace, when we have the means; but now when we have not the means, when our finances are in such a condition that the most hopeful almost despair of them, to throw away this money is eminently improper. I suppose, however, it is hardly worth while to make an objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that the Senator from Pennsylvania is not informed in regard to the nature of this document.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it a public document?

Mr. SUMNER. I will state. The Secretary of War some time last summer constituted a commission, compose of three eminent gentlemen, Robert Dale Owen of Indiana, James McKay of New York, and Dr. S. G. Howe of Boston, to consider the condition of the freedmen under the acts of Congress and the proclamation of the President. That commission has been laboriously occupied during this whole year. It has taken a vast amount of testimony, from General Halleck and General Butler down to agents and superintendents in Louisiana and at Hilton Head. In short, it has spared no pains to arrive at accurate information with regard to the condition of freedmen about whom we are now legislating. That commission has gathered together the results of all this testimony. It has summed it up in a very elaborate report, mainly from the pen of the chairman, Mr. Owen. I have had an opportunity of looking into the report, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is one of the most able contributions to this question that has ever appeared in our country or in any other country. It sheds great light on the present condition of the freedmen of our country and on our duties in regard to them in the future.

Now, sir, it has been reduced to writing. It is not a verbal report. It has been formally communicated to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War has formally communicated it to us. Now, shall the document be allowed to rest in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, where of course it will be accessible to comparatively few—perhaps no person will look it through there—or shall it be imparted to the public? This commission will have been constituted in vain, I may say literally in vain, if we do not communicate the result of its inquiries to the public. I hope there will be no hesitation in agreeing to the motion to print.

Mr. COWAN. I did not object from any special reason arising from the nature of the publication proposed, but my opposition was general, intended to apply to all publications which we could do without at this time. That is my motion. I think there should not be a single dollar expended except on the ground of necessity. Everything that could be avoided at this time especially should be avoided. I would ask under what law these commissioners were appointed, and by what authority they have gone to all this pains to make this elaborate report, and whether, if it be such a valuable report as is here supposed, it cannot be put before the country in some other way than by the expenditure of the public money. In this age of publication, when every table in every house is loaded with information of all kinds and on all subjects, when the whole country is flooded with newspapers desirous and anxious to obtain that particular species of information which would interest the people, I should think there was machinery enough in existence which would gratuitously give to the people all they desire to know on this subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say a word on the general remark of the Senator from Pennsylvania. This particular resolution I shall leave to the Senator from Massachusetts who introduced it, and who is more familiar with the subject than I am. It has been the object of the Committee on Printing at this session to reduce the public printing to the lowest possible amount, and we have been oftener voted down by the Senate increasing the number we proposed to print than by diminishing it. A bill has just been passed by both Houses which was reported by that committee, and which I think will materially reduce the cost of the public printing, and eventually lead to the documents being furnished to the public with very little expense to the Government, to be purchased by persons who really want them and care for them, and who will pay the cost of printing and paper. That will be the ultimate result. This particular publication will cost between seven and eight hundred dollars. The matter was considered of sufficient importance to be intrusted to a commission consisting of very able and distinguished men, and in some form or other the results should be laid before the public.

Mr. COWAN. Was there any law authorizing the commission?

Mr. ANTHONY. That was a matter which we did not investigate because it was not within our province. Our province was to ascertain what this publication would cost, and to judge whether it was worth the cost. We thought it was, but at the same time we are not at all strenuous upon the point.

Mr. COWAN. I think the committee should have confined themselves to printing that which was authorized by law.

Mr. HALE. I want to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether the usual number of this document has been ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The usual number has been ordered.

Mr. HALE. I should think that was enough. Mr. ANTHONY. The extra number will cost nothing for type-setting. It will merely cost the expense of press-work and paper. It will cost much less proportionally to print three thousand copies than to print the usual number, which is one thousand five hundred and fifty.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that is not one of the peculiarities of this report.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, it is general.

Mr. HALE. Then I think the usual number is enough.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLEY. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether this commission was authorized by law under any act of Congress to make this report.

Mr. ANTHONY. That question was asked before. The Committee on Printing did not investigate that subject. They did not consider that within their province, nor have the committee read the report.

Mr. WILLEY. On this side of the House we heard scarcely any of the discussion in consequence of gentlemen on the other side speaking so low. My impression is that the question of the freedmen is going to be a very important question hereafter; and if this information comes under authority of law in a shape that would throw light on the subject in any official form I should be glad to have it; but we should not authorize the publishing of mere fugitive productions.

Mr. ANTHONY. This report was officially communicated to Congress by the Secretary of War, and we presumed of course that he had authority for doing it. We did not go behind the act of the Secretary of War. It would hardly be proper for us, I conceive, to examine into the legality of the commission or of the proceedings which have resulted in any report that is submitted to us. I believe some of the Senators think that the Department of Agriculture is unconstitutional, but we did not take that matter into consideration when we reported the resolution to print copies of the agricultural report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question, and that is whether the commission which has been making these investigations was raised pursuant to any authority of law.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think gentlemen on the other side of the House must hear very indistinctly to-day, for I have just answered that question, and I answered it twice before. The committee know nothing about this report except that it was officially communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of War. They presumed, of course, that he had a right to do it; and as the Senate accepted it and referred it to the Committee on Printing, the only question the committee took into consideration was, how much it would cost to publish it and whether the information it contained was of sufficient value to make the publication advisable, and on that they rather took the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts and others who had read the report than their own judgment. None of us read it unless perhaps the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL.] He may have gone through it, but I am sure no other member of the committee has. He can answer for himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall certainly not vote to go to the expense of publishing every document that comes before the Senate. I think it is a violent presumption on the part of the Committee on Printing that everything done by the War Department is done pursuant to law. The Senator from Rhode Island presumes that without examining any statute on the subject. Here is a document that comes before us from a commission not known to any law as far as I am aware. The commission was organized by some Department of the Government. Whether the members are paid or not, I am not prepared to say, but I presume they are not working without pay. The committee report to us that this document has not been read by any member of the committee. Whether it is worth anything or not, whether it is worth any portion of the cost to the Government or not, the committee are not prepared to say. The committee say that they get some information from other gentlemen; but is the Senate to incur a cost to the Government on information like that? It does not come from any body of men organized pursuant to law; it has not been read by the committee; but simply now, as the committee assure the body, because the Senator from Massachusetts has told the committee that it is a document worthy of publication, we are to go to the expense of publishing it.

When a document comes here pursuant to law, I do not ask the question whether it is valuable or not; it ought to be published that we may know what the Departments of the Government are doing; but this document does not come before the Senate with that force. It is not the report of the proceedings of any Department of the Government, or of any commission organized pursuant to law, but it is, as I understand it, an irregular proceeding outside of law; and we are asked to publish it, for what purpose? Not to see what the Government is doing, not to see what the opinion of any Department of the Government is in respect to any great question, but to see what facts and arguments a certain set of gentlemen, irresponsible so far as law is concerned, have seen fit to present in some communication which they have made to the War Department. When such a document is asked to be printed at the expense of the Government by the Printing Committee, that committee ought to have examined it and to be able to state to the Senate that it is worthy of this expenditure of the public money. If it was an account of the doings of the Secretary of War or of any officer under him, I grant that it being reported here in pursuance of law the presumption would be that the people ought to know it; but when the War Department sees fit to send here facts collated and arguments presented by certain gentlemen not authorized by law to collate the facts or present the arguments, the committee ought to have examined the document so as to be able to inform the Senate whether intrinsically it is worthy of publication at the public expense. If it is such a document as Senators wish to go to the country, let them meet the expense out of their own pockets and not ask the Government to bear it unless the document comes here from some Department according to law.

It is suggested to me by a Senator near by that we published General McClellan's report. That was a public document. It related to the proceedings of the Army in an important period of our history, and the doings of a Department of the Government. It was proper to publish it upon general principles. If this is a document worthy of publication let it seek the channels that other private enterprises have to seek. If it will pay for the expense of its publication let the publishers of the country take hold of it and present it to the people.

Mr. CONNESS. It is perhaps a little unfortunate—it is strange at least, if not unfortunate—that nothing can be introduced here involving the poor, miserable negro, that is not either illegal or unconstitutional. Why is not this report made in pursuance of law? Has the President as the Executive of this Government not the right to institute a commission to inquire into the administration of affairs, and this particular branch of administration that the country has taken charge of? Surely he has. There can scarcely be a question raised on that point. The other day a report came here, one of the ablest I am told ever made from the Treasury Department, and it was officially stated that that report was prepared by three distinguished gentlemen; but there was no question about its being the act of the head of the Treasury Department, and I apprehend there is no question either about this report being the act of the President. He speaks through the commission that he has appointed. They have collected facts and collated them and presented them to the War Department, and through that Department they are transmitted to this body, and the question is, shall they be published; shall a certain number of copies be printed? It involves an expense of about seven hundred dollars, I believe, and it is immediately discovered to be unconstitutional and void for want of legal authorization! I hope, sir, we shall have a time when this whole negro subject will be disposed of, and when we can take up some subject and vote upon something without its impeding the progress of public business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to ask the Senator from California a question. The Senator says objection has been made to this because of its want of constitutionality. I did not hear that objection made. I wish to ask the Senator whether the head of a Department has the right to appoint officers not known to the law, to appoint a commission of three men and pay them salaries, and have the report made by them regarded as an official report, when no such commission is known to the laws of the land?

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand that this commission was appointed by any Department, but by the President of the United States, who is charged with the administration of the laws and with the conduct of the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senate is precluded from inquiring into the official character of this document. Senators forget that this document was communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate. On the 26th of last month the Senate passed a resolution calling on the Secretary of War to communicate to us this report. The Secretary has done so, and now the question is whether we shall print it or not. I admire very much the theory of the Senator from Indiana, that it is the duty of the Committee on Printing not only to read at length and critically examine every document presented to them, but also to go into the legality and constitutionality of all the proceedings of the officers by whom a document is communicated. If it was not so very near the close of the session, I should certainly move that the Senator from Indiana be added to the Committee on Printing, and we should endeavor to keep him very fully occupied during the whole time. Next session I hope that the committee will consist of four, and that the Senator will be added for that particular purpose. I hold in my hand the communication from the Secretary of War, which I will read. It is very brief.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1864.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, dated May 26, 1864, I forward herewith a copy of the preliminary report, and also of the final report of the American Freedman's Inquiry Commission, which comprise all the papers deemed proper for publication.

Very respectfully, &c., E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. DANIEL CLARK,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

That is the report the committee have recommended shall be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe this is a proposition to print a report made by Robert Dale Owen. I once read a book published by that distinguished gentleman called Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World, and I think that anybody who has ever read that book and been cheated out of $1 25 will never want to read anything else coming from the pen of Robert Dale Owen. Such a conglomeration of infidelity and nonsense was never before published to the people of this country, and I apprehend that the man who could write such a book as that is not capable of writing anything that is worthy of the perusal of any member of the Senate, and therefore I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. WADE. I have taken occasion to read this document all through; and if I favored the institution of slavery in any of its forms, I would oppose its publication to the last, for I know of no document in the English language that sets forth the deformities of that institution in practice more vividly than does this document. I have no doubt it is truthful in every word. I know some of the gentlemen who were on the commission; and I say again that if I favored the institution of slavery and wished to cover up its deformity, I would vote against this publication and if I could get rid of it by technicalities or by pettifoggery I would do it. I think these suggestions about this being unauthorized are afterthoughts. I think gentlemen have probably read the document. Why did they not oppose sending it to the committee? If we have no jurisdiction over it and nothing to do with it, why was not the objection made then? It seems to me strange that an objection of this kind comes at this late hour after we have called on the Secretary of War to give us this report, and in compliance with our request he has sent it here and we have referred it to a committee for the very purpose of ascertaining whether it ought to be printed and they have reported that it ought to be.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—8.
ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Willey, and Wright—17.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ELIPHALET BROWN, JR.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of E. Brown, jr., praying for additional compensation for his services as artist in the naval expedition to Japan under Commodore Perry, have instructed me to report a bill for his relief. It is a very small affair, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 334) for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr., artist in the Japan expedition, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to E. Brown, jr., of $1,800 per annum as artist of the late Japan expedition during the time he was actually employed in that service, deducting the amount already paid him as master's mate on the expedition.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to hear some reason for passing the bill.

Mr. HALE. I will state the case to the Senator from Vermont. When the expedition of Commodore Perry was started he wanted some artists to take sketches, &c., but there was no provision in the law for doing it. He employed three or four of them, and agreed with them that they should go as masters' mates, and that if the thing succeeded he would recommend to Congress that they should be paid a certain salary. They went; the expedition was successful; and every one of them has been paid except Eliphalet Brown, jr., who was one of the most eminent of them. He was absent from the country when the others were paid.

Mr. COLLAMER. Was there a special act of Congress for paying the others?

Mr. HALE. There was.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire additionally if there is any statement from Commodore Perry.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; there is a letter from Commodore Perry among the papers; he speaks very highly of this man.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. RICHNER.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia have directed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 121) for the relief of Lieutenant William P. Richner, seventy-seventh regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, and recommend its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that bill involves only five or six hundred dollars, six months' pay clearly due, as everybody will see on hearing the report, I ask that it be acted on now.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the Secretary of War is to cause to be paid to William P. Richner, first lieutenant company H seventy-seventh regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant from the 31st day of December, 1861, to the 31st day of August, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARREST OF H. F. ZIMMERMAN.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether Henry F. Zimmerman, of the city of Washington, has been arrested and imprisoned by any order of the War Department, and if so, for what cause, and under what form of process.

NAVY-YARD AT CAIRO.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 190) to establish a navy-yard and depot at Cairo in the State of Illinois, report that the Senate disagree to the amendments and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to know as a matter of order whether a motion to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives does not take precedence of the motion to disagree?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it does.

Mr. GRIMES. I move, then, that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives, and I desire to say one word. When this bill was before the Senate the other day I stated that, so far as my knowledge extended, there was not a single individual familiar with the subject who was in favor of the establishment of a navy-yard at Cairo, but on the contrary that every individual connected with the Navy who had been in the western flotilla was opposed to it. I stated furthermore that I had a letter from Admiral Porter, who I suppose is more familiar with the subject than anybody in the country, a letter volunteered by him adverse to the proposition of establishing the navy-yard permanently at any place by act of Congress, but saying that if it was necessary to establish one—of which he seemed to entertain some doubt—a commission should be appointed of officers to examine the various points. I had not that letter with me then. I have it now, and I propose to read it. As I have said, it is not a letter which was called out from Admiral Porter by anything I wrote on the subject to him, or that any other individual did, but was volunteered by him in view of what he believed to be the public interest in this connection.

MISSISSIPPI SQUADRON, FLAGSHIP BLACK HAWK,
CAIRO, February 21, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers that a resolution has been offered in the House of Representatives to vote $500,000 for a navy yard at Cairo. This is only a move of speculators, and I hope that no place will be specified in the West without the matter being examined by a competent board of naval officers. Cairo is not the place anyhow. I do not know that we want any navy yard appropriation just yet. I have fitted out the largest squadron in the Navy with a few old Fremont mortar boats converted into black-smith shops, and a few floating carpenter shops, and can now get along very well.

I thought it right to inform you of this matter, as there is no use to waste any more money than can be helped.

Very truly yours, DAVID D. PORTER,

Rear Admiral.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senate, Washington, District of Columbia.

I have nothing further to say except that this is a letter from a gentleman who is more conversant with this subject confessedly than any other man in the country, who has had experience for a year and a half in that flotilla, who has built it up almost entirely; and in his opinion I think every gentleman who is connected with the profession in the West fully concurs. I have nothing to say in regard to the particular place at this time, but I trust the Senate will adopt the amendment of the House of Representatives, which authorizes the President of the United States to establish a commission of naval officers to go and investigate, first, whether we need a naval depot and navy-yard upon the western waters, and, second, where it ought to be. I call for the reading of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to change the title of the bill to read, "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a commission to select a site for a navy-yard and naval station on the western waters, and for other purposes;" and to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy do, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to appoint a commission, consisting of one naval officer, one officer of the engineer corps, and one civilian, to select the most approved site for a navy-yard and naval station on the Mississippi river, or upon one of its tributaries, and to report to the next session of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The only objection I have to concurring in the House amendment is the delay that will be occasioned by it, and the necessity there is for establishing a navy-yard at an early day and during the war. I should have no sort of objection in any other point of view, for I have no doubt that the board would select Cairo as the proper place, or somewhere in that vicinity; for notwithstanding the Senator from Iowa has said that everybody knows that Cairo is not the place, I differ with him altogether. I think everybody acquainted with the western waters knows that Cairo is the point where commodities exchange, where the different classes of steamboats change their cargoes. It has been made the point now by the war.

Mr. GRIMES. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the great point, let me tell the Senator from Iowa, whence all the expeditions have started to the Southwest. That is where Foote went from, that is where Grant went from, that is where Sherman concentrated his army.

Mr. GRIMES. Does not the Senator know that the Navy Department and the officers in command there found it necessary to move everything away from Cairo and take it to Mound City, nine miles distant? They could not get along at all at Cairo.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know that one of the officers has moved off to Mound City, and perhaps Mound City is the proper place. The bill says "at or near Cairo," and was designed to embrace Mound City. I think that was a mistake of the particular naval officer. My judgment is, if I were to express an opinion—I have seen both places—that there is a great misapprehension in regard to Mound City. It has a name that carries with it the impression that it is higher ground than Cairo. That is not true. Mound City is just as much subject to overflow as Cairo, and it derives its name Mound City from a little artificial mound not more than forty feet square, about as big as a hay-stack. The name, Mound City, has created, I have no doubt, in the minds of many who do not know about Mound City, a false impression as to its elevation. The ground overflows there the same as at Cairo and has to be protected at both places by levees. Now there is no protection at Mound City as there is at Cairo.

In regard to this letter of Admiral Porter, addressed to the Senator from Iowa, he regards that as conclusive of the opinions of the Navy. Admiral Porter very modestly goes on to question whether we should have any naval depot or not. The Secretary of the Navy, who consults with all the admirals, and to whom it is the duty of Admiral Porter to report, and to whom, doubtless, Admiral Porter did report, on examination of all the reports has recommended year after year the establishment of a navy-yard and depot in the West; but Admiral Porter, forsooth, has written a letter to a member of the Senate, in which he doubts very much whether any yard is necessary or not. That is his opinion about it. I have been informed, notwithstanding what Admiral Porter says in regard to his fitting up the gunboats in the West and the character of the boats we have there, that we have expended many millions of dollars in constructing a navy upon the western waters, and I have been further informed that we should have saved millions of dollars already if we had had a navy-yard and depot in the West.

We have appropriated at this very session of Congress more than two million dollars for the purpose of simply repairing navy-yards all over the country in the East. We appropriated $100,000 or more for repairs of the Norfolk navy-yard. It was proper, I presume, that it should be appropriated. I suppose it was done on the recommendation of the Department. Now we have a large fleet on the western waters where we have got no navy-yard all. Why is this opposition to having a navy-yard upon the western waters any more than upon the Atlantic coast, and especially why does it come from the Senator from Iowa? Admiral Porter doubts if any navy-yard is necessary. Perhaps Admiral Porter doubts if any is necessary on the Atlantic coast or anywhere else; and is his doubt to govern the Senate?

But, sir, I do not wish to argue this matter over again or to take up time in reference to it. The only objection I have to this commission arises out of the fact that if you appoint a commission to make this investigation you put the thing over at the very time when it is desirable that we should commence this work and have the benefit of the navy-yard. I know no reason why the Senate should defer to this volunteer opinion of Admiral Porter. I do not know that Admiral Porter knows more than all the rest of the Navy in regard to this matter. I do not know that he knows more than the Secretary of the Navy. The annual communication of the Navy Department which is sent to Congress comes through the Executive, and that contains the suggestions of the head of the Department. This is the first time, I believe, in my experience here that subordinate officers in the Army or Navy have come in with recommendations in opposition to the head of the Department. What are we coming to if such a practice is to prevail? Shall each general in the Army write a report in opposition to the recommendations of the War Department and send it here and the Senate take up its time in reading what each captain or colonel or general may recommend? We had better alter our laws and make it a part of the act of Congress that in addition to the annual reports from the heads of Departments all the subordinates in those Departments shall give their opinions. The Senator from Iowa would have us overrule the Secretary on this volunteer opinion, and not only a volunteer opinion sent to Congress to control its action in opposition to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, but it would seem to me an impertinent interference of a subordinate officer with the recommendations of the head of the Department. I can regard it in no other light. I shall vote for the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I trust the Senate will sustain that report and let a committee of conference meet, and if they think proper after consultation with the House committee to agree upon a commission, as I said, there is no sort of objection on our part to it except simply the delay that will be thus occasioned.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is astonished that the opposition to this bill should come from me. I will tell the Senator why I am opposed to it. It is because I know Cairo, and I know it as well as the Senator does. I am satisfied that it is the place where the Government can sink the most money with the least advantage to it and to the service that can be found on the habitable globe, at any rate that can be found on this continent. It is because I love the Navy, and I want to protect it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator just now to favor Mound City. I should like to know if Mound City has any advantage over Cairo?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is very apt to draw wrong conclusions and to make garbled statements which create false impressions, as I shall show before I am through. I have not said that I was in favor of Mound City. I have said in private conversation, though not in the Senate, that if the navy-yard were established at any place in that vicinity it ought to be at Mound City rather than at Cairo, and that I did not believe the provision of the bill as it was passed by the Senate providing for the establishment of a yard "at or near Cairo" would include Mound City.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the unfinished business of Saturday, which is Senate bill No. 171, relative to the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose we might as well dispose of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be informally laid aside, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Illinois says that the letter of Admiral Porter is impertinent because it conflicts with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. It does not conflict with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy at all. The Secretary of the Navy has proposed that a navy-yard should be established in the West. Admiral Porter says he entertains a doubt as to whether we need an appropriation at this time for this purpose. He says, "I don't know that we want any navy-yard appropriation just yet;" and he says also, "Cairo is not the place anyhow." In regard to that matter he has had some experience. He has been two years on the western waters; for a large portion of that time he has been stationed at this very place, Cairo. He found, and the officers in conjunction with him all unanimously found, that it was to the public interest and to the personal advantage of every person connected with the fleet to make the transfer to Mound City.

The Senator says that Mound City is not higher than Cairo, and that the only elevation at Mound City is an artificial mound. Do you suppose that Admiral Porter, who has been there two years, does not know whether Mound City is not higher than Cairo is? Do you suppose that he transferred the naval depot from Cairo to Mound City merely because there happened to be a little artificial mound in the vicinity of Mound City or in the rear of it, not bigger we are told than a hay-stack? Is that the basis on which Admiral Porter acted? He acted, I suppose, from the highest considerations of public interest, and he believed that the health of his squadron would be promoted and that the public interest would be subserved by moving the depot to Mound City; and yet it is now proposed by act of Congress to fasten it permanently at Cairo.

The Senator says he would consent to the proposition made by the House of Representatives if it were not for the length of time that it will take to establish the navy-yard. Does the Senator suppose that we are going to establish this navy-yard, and get workshops erected, and machinery put into them, and mechanics assembled around it, so as to live conveniently and healthily, within the next summer or within the next two years even? I apprehend not.

I know Cairo; I know that the levee which keeps the water out of it is required to be as high as the top of a two-story house; and I know, and I think the Senator does, that although it is only at extreme high water, occurring once in from three or four to ten years, that the water breaks over the levee, yet every year in the season of high water it slips through the levee so as to make inside of the levee from five to ten feet of stagnant water. Knowing as I do that more money can be expended there than at any other place on the Mississippi or Ohio river with less advantage to the Government, I did feel alarmed when I saw the Senate make the appropriation contained in the original bill on a day when gold was 256 in New York, and I did desire that the appropriation should be defeated. I wanted a commission of skillful officers appointed to go and determine where this navy-yard should be established, and not by an act of Congress, without any recommendation from anybody, absolutely fix it at Cairo.

The Senator wants to know whether we are going to accept the opinion of Admiral Porter in opposition to the opinion of everybody else in the Navy. Will the Senator tell me who else in the Navy is in favor of Cairo? Can he name one officer? Not one. He lugs in here the name of the Secretary of the Navy as being in favor of it. Has the Secretary of the Navy proposed to establish a navy-yard at Cairo? I have never seen any recommendation of that kind from him. The Senator seems to think that it was improper that Admiral Porter should write me a letter on this subject. What was it that the Senator quoted the other day? Did he not parade a letter of Admiral Foote, addressed to a member of Congress from Missouri, a private letter as this is, no more public than this?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator from Iowa does not mean to be inaccurate. That was a case where a letter was addressed by Mr. Noell, I think, to the Navy Department, and by the Navy Department referred to Admiral Foote.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. That was a letter addressed by Admiral Foote to Mr. Noell, a member of Congress from Missouri. A copy of it seems to have got into the Navy Department and was called for by the House of Representatives. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us not have a dispute about a matter of fact. The letter of Admiral Foote was transmitted to the other House by the Department:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 7, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed on the 29th ultimo, requesting the Secretary of the Navy to "communicate to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of Commodore Foote's report on the necessity of establishing a navy-yard and depot for naval purposes on the western waters, and the point where the same should be established, which report was addressed to Hon. John W. Noell, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and dated February 5, 1862," and, in compliance therewith, to transmit herewith a copy of the report indicated.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRIMES. Now let us look at this. This is a letter of Admiral Foote in answer to a letter from Mr. Noell, a member of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, written on the 5th of February, 1863, and, as appears on its face, written without any stimulation or direction of the Naval Committee. It is simply a letter, neither more nor less, although it is called in the resolution of the other House calling for it a "report." The only difference between the letter of Admiral Foote from which the Senator read when the subject was under consideration the other day and the letter of Admiral Porter is that the letter of Admiral Foote was called out by a letter addressed to him by a member of the House of Representatives, and the letter of Admiral Porter was not called out, but was volunteered by him. I submit that it is hardly fair for the Senator from Illinois to condemn Admiral Porter for writing to me, and at the same time use a letter from Admiral Foote written under very similar circumstances.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no importance in this matter, but it is better to be accurate and correct, and I do not wish any wrong impression to go out. The document which I read was a public document, communicated to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy as the report of Admiral Foote. It may have been made at the instance of a member of Congress; I do not know how that was. The paper which the Senator from Iowa has read is a private letter addressed to him, and never saw the Navy Department, I presume. I should have doubted whether Admiral Porter would be guilty of such insubordination, as I call it, as to write a communication of that kind at variance with the report of the Secretary of the Navy—not the report of the Secretary of the Navy in favor of establishing a navy-yard at Cairo; the Senator from Iowa misunderstood me if he understood me to say that the Secretary of the Navy recommended the establishment of a navy-yard at Cairo; but what I said was that the Secretary of the Navy recommended the establishment of a navy-yard on the western waters, and he has recommended more than once. Admiral Porter takes issue with him; he doubts the propriety of a yard at all. That was the point to which I called attention.

Mr. HALE. I rise simply to state the view the committee took. I have no feeling in this contest. The Senate, by a very decided vote, I think four or five to one, passed the bill to establish a navy-yard at Cairo. The House of Representatives adopted an amendment, not the one that was proposed here, to commit the subject to a board of naval officers, but to commit it to one naval officer, one engineer, and one civilian. The Committee on Naval Affairs thought that this was a third proposition, and that it was better to let the bill stand as it is and send it to a committee of conference who may probably agree on something that will be acceptable to both Houses.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the attention of the Senate will not be diverted from the merit of this case by the side-issue that is got up here as to Admiral Foote and Admiral Porter. It will be remembered that when this matter was before the Senate the other day the propriety of establishing a commission to investigate it before proceeding precipitately as had been recommended by the Naval Committee of this body was urged. The House of Representatives, it seems, by a very large majority, a majority so large that the opposition could not even get enough to call the yeas and nays, has decided in favor of that proposition and determined upon appointing a commission to investigate the various localities prior to any such establishment. The question is whether we shall do so. I trust that those who concur in that view will vote for the proposition which is made in the shape of an amendment by the House of Representatives. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Davis, Hale, McDougall, Morgan, Powell, Trumbull, and Wade—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was concurred in.

CONVENTION WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire if any legislation is needed in order to carry into effect any treaty with the United States of Colombia, reported a bill (S. No. 335) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia.

Mr. SUMNER. As this is a matter of practical interest and must be acted upon by the other House during this session, I ask that it may be proceeded with now.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read three times, and passed. It proposes to renew, reenact, and apply to the convention with the United States of Colombia of February 10, 1864, the first eight sections of the act to carry into effect conventions between the United States and the republics of New Granada and Costa Rica, approved February 20, 1861.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 25th instant the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 85) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army;

A bill (S. No. 115) to amend an act entitled "An act to define the powers and duties of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia;"

A bill (S. No. 162) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863;

A bill (S. No. 253) to amend the act of the 21st December, 1861, entitled "An act to further promote the efficiency of the Navy;"

A bill (S. No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 270) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862;

A bill (S. No. 279) to amend the act of Congress making donations to the settlers on the public lands in Oregon, approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory thereto;

A bill (S. No. 306) to grant to the State of California certain lands for State prison purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 44) for the relief of clerks at the Kittery and Philadelphia navy-yards.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, which amendment is a substitute for the House bill, and is the Senate bill that was passed by this body several days ago, with a few verbal and inconsiderable alterations; and the committee have instructed me to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot consent. I must insist upon taking up the loan bill.

Mr. HOWARD. This bill has been discussed in all its clauses, and I really do not believe it will occupy the time of the Senate for more than a few minutes. If it were likely to consume much time I would not ask to have it taken up now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very important to pass the loan bill to-day, and I cannot consent that anything shall come up now that will lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill reported by the Senator from Michigan cannot now be considered.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the loan bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R.

No. 540) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the eighth section of the bill, which was as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever any bond, Treasury note, or certificate of indebtedness of the United States which shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment, being due, or presented for conversion under any act of Congress, shall be or shall have been claimed by any person or corporation other than the person or corporation in whose possession the same shall be, by filing a caveat with the Secretary of the Treasury against the payment of the same, the Secretary of the Treasury shall notify such claimant in writing of the fact of such presentation and require him within a reasonable time, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to commence proceedings for the adjudication of the claim before some court of competent jurisdiction, and to give satisfactory security to pay any damages occasioned by delay of payment and costs of suit, and to transmit a duly certified copy of the bill or complaint to the Secretary of the Treasury. And in case of the failure of such claimant to comply with such requirement, the Secretary of the Treasury shall make payment to the party in possession of and presenting such bond, Treasury note, or certificate of indebtedness, or direct the conversion of the same if convertible as though no such contesting claim had been made or caveat filed. But this act shall not be construed to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the payment of coupons detached from bonds by whomsoever presented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the eleventh section to strike out the word "alter" and insert "utter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following proviso to the thirteenth section:

And provided further, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be held or construed to deprive any person of the right to retain in his custody and possession and use for any lawful purpose any engraved or transfused plate, block, or electrotype, or any die, roll, or other original work as aforesaid which had been used by him in printing or engraving bank notes or other obligations before being used in printing any obligation or other security authorized to be issued by any act of Congress; nor shall any of said foregoing provisions be held or construed to prohibit or restrain the lawful use by any person of any ink, color, or pigment the exclusive right to which has been secured to any such person by letters patent which are still in force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury has sent me an amendment in order to meet a possible difficulty that may arise. It is to insert after "stated" in line twenty-one of section six the following words:

And all coupons bearing the engraved signature of the Register of the Treasury in office at the time when such signatures were authorized and engraved shall have full force, validity, and effect, notwithstanding such Register may have subsequently ceased to hold office as such, when issued in connection with bonds duly authorized and signed by or for the successor or successors of said Register.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At the end of the third section I move to insert "except so far as it may affect $75,000,000 of bonds already advertised."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ROOMS FOR THE AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department, and I ask that it be put upon its passage now.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that the space assigned to the Department of Agriculture in the Patent Office building, included between the central crypt and the west wing in the first story on the south front, is entirely inadequate to the necessities of the Department, two of the rooms within these limits being used as furnace-rooms for the Patent Office, one as a chemical laboratory, and another having recently been taken for the use of the Land Office, leaving but five rooms, with one small store-room, for the business of the Department; and that additional rooms are indispensably necessary for the convenience of the Commissioner, for the accommodation of clerks engaged in the collection and compilation of statistics and in other official duties; for the better accommodation of the operations of the chemist in making agricultural tests, analyses, and experiments, and for the arrangement and exhibition of pomological, entomological, and agricultural specimens, models, and paintings; and it is therefore provided that, in addition to the rooms now occupied by the Department of Agriculture, there shall be assigned to that Department the suite of rooms upon the first floor included between the southwest corner and the western entrance of the Patent Office building.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound on the Pacific coast by the northern route, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was in line forty-four of section one to strike out "Edward" and insert "William," so as to make the name of one of the corporators "William Leighton" instead of "Edward Leighton."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "be" in line sixteen of section two to insert "consistent with public policy and the welfare of the said Indians;" so as to make the clause read:

The United States shall extinguish, as rapidly as may be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the said Indians, the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act, and acquired in the donation to the road named in this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line seven, after the word "of" to insert "public;" after "land" in line eight to insert "not mineral;" after "title" in line fourteen to insert "not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated;" after "fixed" in line seventeen to insert "and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office;" after the word "been" in line nineteen to insert "granted;" after "sold" in line twenty to insert "reserved, occupied by homestead settlers;" after "pre-empted" in line twenty-one to insert "or otherwise disposed of;" and after "sections" in line twenty-three to insert "and designated by odd numbers;" so as to make the section read:

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores, over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any State, and whenever, on the line thereof, the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from preemption or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed, and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and whenever, prior to said time, any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-empted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections, and designated by odd numbers, not more than ten miles beyond the limits of said alternate sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line twenty-six, to strike out "same" before "line;" after "line" to strike out "upon which" and insert "of;" after "any" in line twenty-six to insert "other;" after "route" in line twenty-seven to strike out "within the State of Minnesota;" before "general" in line thirty to insert "same;" after "amount" in line thirty-one to strike out "now;" and after "granted" in line thirty-two to insert "by this act;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That if said route shall be found upon the line of any other railroad route to aid in the construction of which lands have been heretofore granted by the United States, as far as the routes are upon the same general line, the amount of land heretofore granted shall be deducted from the amount granted by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso in section three:

Provided further, That all mineral lands be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operations of this act, and in lieu thereof a like quantity of unoccupied and unappropriated agricultural lands nearest to the line of said road may be selected as above provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "lands" in line twelve of section four to insert "situated opposite to and continuous with said completed section of said road."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following provisos at the end of section four:

Provided, That not more than ten sections of land per mile, as said road shall be completed, shall be conveyed to said company for all that part of said railroad lying east of the western boundary of the State of Minnesota, until the whole of said railroad shall be finished and in good running order, as a first-class railroad, from the place of beginning on Lake Superior to the summit of the Rocky mountains: Provided also, That lands shall not be granted under the provisions of this act on account of any railroad, or part thereof, constructed at the date of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, line seventeen, after the word "built" to insert "by the United States or;" so as to make the clause read:

And it shall be the duty of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to permit any other railroad which shall be authorized to be built by the United States or by the Legislature of any Territory or State in which the same may be situated, to form running connections with it, on fair and equitable terms.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "company" in line nine to insert "as provided in this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight of section seven, in the following words:

And shall also deduct from the damages to be awarded to the applicant for the same any increase in the value due to the construction of the road of the premises retained by him, provided such premises formed a portion of those taken.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventy-seven of section seven to strike out "and may" and insert "but the judge of the court hearing said suit shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert "he" before "may" in line eighty of section seven.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighty-three of section seven to strike out "three" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

But in case no claimant shall appear within six years from the time of the opening of said road across any land, all claims to damages against said company shall be barred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "for" in line two of section fifteen to insert "the period indicated in the by-laws of said company not exceeding;" so as to read:

That the president, vice president, and directors shall hold their offices for the period indicated in the by-laws of said company, not exceeding three years, respectively, and until others are chosen in their place, and qualified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to said company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall be first paid into the Treasury of the United States by said company or party in interest the gross cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said roads, and so from year to year, until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. There is a clerical error in the eighth line of section seven. The word "its" should be "his."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That alteration will be made.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer a short amendment to come in at the end of the third section, simply to define the word "mineral" where it occurs in the bill, and to conform to the definition given in the general Pacific railroad bill:

And provided further, That the word "mineral," where it occurs in this act, shall not be held to include iron or coal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In line twenty-six of section one I move to strike out "John E. Perley" and insert "Ellsworth Cheeseborough," and in line twenty-seven to strike out "F. W. Emery" and insert "James S. Emery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose to amend this bill by adding to the fifth section the following clause:

And that for the purpose of aiding the construction of such railroad connections with the navigable channel of the Mississippi river, the grants of lands hitherto made to the State of Minnesota and now vested in the Winona and St. Peter Railroad Company and in the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, are hereby enlarged to ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of the said railroad lines, to be selected and allotted to said railroad companies in the manner and under the conditions prescribed by this act.

Mr. HARLAN. That proposition has not been considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and I am unprepared to say just how it would affect the communications with this road. Congress has at this session enlarged the grants to two roads running jointly entirely across the State of Minnesota. The bill now pending, without the adoption of this amendment, gives a large grant of land to Minnesota virtually to aid in the construction of another line across the State from east to west, across the whole breadth of the State; and I think it would be better not to add this amendment at this time without consideration.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think that my suggestion really would perfect the bill, as it seems to me somewhat defective as it is. In the winter when ice has closed Lake Superior with a coating of about five or six feet of ice there will be no outlet for the business of this road unless it be furnished through the communication mentioned in my amendment, so as to give an opportunity of getting down to the railroad systems of Wisconsin and Minnesota. Without it the bill is worth nothing, and for six months in the year no transportation can be had on the road; but by the assistance which I propose, the extension of the grants from six to ten miles on each side of the two railroads I have named, those roads will be enabled to hurry on their connections with the Northern Pacific railroad, and make it available at an early day. I think if the Senate will reflect on the importance of these connections they will not hesitate about adopting the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no greater obstruction to the passage of Pacific railroad bills than a disposition to connect with them collateral questions. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. When a standing committee of this body shall declare that the ice in the lake is as thick as the Senator states, though I have no reason to doubt his statement, and when it shall be officially stated by a committee that the grant of land made to the railroad companies in Minnesota should be increased to ten sections a mile, I shall have no objection to voting for it; but I hope that no branches and no collateral questions will be allowed to be fastened upon our Pacific railroad bills. Let us consider them as great propositions. My friend from Minnesota, generous in his nature, is also very generous in his applications for the appropriation of public land for railroads. One would suppose that he would be content with the amount already appropriated this year to his State or to companies within his State. I am sure that I cannot now count the number of such bills that I have voted for, or the number of millions of acres included in all the grants made. I hope that we shall stop for this session, and next year when we shall have time to examine the subject more thoroughly we may grant to Minnesota for the purpose of keeping communication open with the rest of the world some additional millions of acres of land.

Mr. RAMSEY. Senators, with a view of prejudicing these grants that are proper in themselves, are in the habit very much of exaggerating the benefits we receive from grants of land made to our State. The grants made this winter do not amount to more than a million acres in all, and they extend over five or six hundred miles of country. But, sir, the position of the Senator from California is somewhat surprising. He has been the earnest advocate of the Central Pacific railroad with half a dozen branches as it approaches the Mississippi river, and not merely land appropriations, but large indorsements of their bonds on the part of the Government.

Mr. CONNESS. Allow me to correct the Senator. I have not advocated any branch to that road but the branches which were established by the law of 1862 under which rights had vested. There was a unanimous vote of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad of this body that no additional branch should be added.

Mr. RAMSEY. Besides the liberal grant to the Central Pacific railroad I think there are some five or six or seven radiating branches, each of which participates in the general grant and the indorsement of bonds by the Government to the extent of $24,000 a mile; but here, when we come to ask for this trifling increase of the land grants to these two roads so as to make connection with the Northern Pacific railroad, we are met with this objection. It is unreasonable, I think, and especially unreasonable on the part of the friends of the Central road. Without these branches this road will be really valueless.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill before the Senate proposes to encourage the construction of a very important railroad to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the waters of the Pacific ocean. Everybody can see at a glance that it is a work of national importance. It proposes to grant lands in a northern latitude where without the construction of a work like that the lands are comparatively without value to the Government. No person acquainted with the condition of that section of country supposes that there can be very extensive settlements until the Government shall encourage those settlements by the construction of some work like this. I do not think that a work of such national importance ought to be embarrassed in its passage through this body and through the House of Representatives by amendments proposing works that are comparatively local. I have favored a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota where I thought it was right. I was in favor of a grant of lands to aid the road from St. Paul up to Lake Superior. Let that road be made; that forms a connection between the capital of the State of Minnesota and that great body of water, and also, if this road is constructed, with this road; and that is a sufficient connection I think for the interests of the State of Minnesota. The Committee on Public Lands has not been prepared, so far as I understand the views of that committee, to recommend as separate propositions the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. We did recommend a grant of ten sections per mile on each side of the road from St. Paul to Lake Superior for reasons peculiar to that work; a similar extension of the grants was made to some of the roads in Wisconsin because of peculiar reasons; but the Senate has not yet agreed that all the grants of a local sort shall be extended as is proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. I am not prepared to say that as a separate proposition I could give the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota my support. There are some reasons that govern my judgment both ways. His proposition ought to be considered separately. One of the roads that he proposes now to increase the grant to, has no connection with the Pacific railroad and never can have except by other roads.

Mr. RAMSEY. What road does the Senator refer to?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Winona and St. Peter road.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is intended to carry it west.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Winona road runs from Winona westward to St. Peter or to Mankato on the Minnesota river, and thus westward with a view of reaching the western boundary of the State of Minnesota—a road that does not and cannot touch the Pacific railroad at all. The other road perhaps may touch the Pacific railroad at some point away to the northwest; but there is not much probability of a road ever being constructed so far north as that, which shall intersect with the proposed road from Lake Superior to Puget sound. But, sir, without reference to the merits of the local railroads in the State of Minnesota, I suggest to the Senate that it is not proper to burden a great national enterprise with amendments such as are proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HARLAN. Perhaps it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the difference between this grant and other land grants that have been made heretofore to aid in the construction of railroads. There is no material difference except in this, that this bill grants four times as much land per mile to the road west of the western boundary of Minnesota as Congress hitherto has ever granted to aid in any other road. It will amount to about twenty-five thousand acres to the mile. The Committee on Public Lands agree to report this bill favorably on account of the vast consequence that will attach to the completion of the road. The land is to be conveyed to the company only as the road progresses. The committee were of opinion that if the road should be built, the Government could well afford to give one half the land, for the distance of forty miles on each side of the road, to secure its completion. If it should not be built, no lands will have been conveyed. Congress never has heretofore granted to exceed ten sections to the mile to aid in the construction of any road. I have felt it my duty as chairman of the committee to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this bill proposes to grant four times the usual quantity of land per mile to aid in the construction of this road westward of the western boundary of Minnesota to the terminus.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up House bill No. 438.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Michigan will allow me to call up the bill that was the unfinished business this morning. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 171.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the consent of the Senator to let us proceed to the consideration of the bill to which I have alluded.

Mr. HOWARD. If it will not consume any time I shall not object.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it will take long. It is the bill in relation to the collection of taxes in insurrectionary districts. It is a bill that will be required to be passed by the House of Representatives; and it is regarded at the Treasury Department as a very important measure.

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot yield for that purpose, I regret to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say that House bill No. 438 is a bill to amend the Pacific railroad act which was passed in 1862. In many respects the bill is a very good one, and in many respects I think it defective. The Senate Committee on the Pacific Railroad had the bill before them this morning and instructed me to offer as an amendment or substitute for it the Pacific railroad bill as it passed the Senate a few weeks ago. In respect to this last Pacific railroad bill, I beg to say that after it passed the Senate and was taken to the House of Representatives it was referred to the committee on the Pacific railroad of that House. They had the bill under consideration, and I suppose in point of fact they have it under their consideration now in committee, because since the reference of it to them that committee have not been able to make any report to the House in consequence of the peculiarity of the rules of the House, so that it is impossible for the committee on the Pacific railroad of the House of Representatives to report back to the House the bill which passed this body. Now, if it be not out of order, I ask to dispense with the reading of the House bill No. 438, which has not been read at length in this body, for the purpose of offering my amendment, which is the substitute recommended by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the Senator from Michigan, the amendment he proposes to offer is simply the bill already passed through this body after mature consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, Mr. President, with a few amendments which I will briefly mention.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is worth while for us to spend two hours to read that bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he just move the amendment, and if any Senator desires information in regard to it he can state it. It is the same bill we acted on before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will be dispensed with by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Now I beg to say, in regard to the amendment which the Committee on the Pacific Railroad have directed me to offer, that it differs from the Pacific railroad bill as it passed the Senate only in the following respects, and to these little matters I beg the particular attention of the Senate.

In the first place, it provides specifically that the present directors of the corporation known as the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall cease to be such on the second Wednesday of October, 1864, and that on that day there shall be an election of a full board of directors of that company, consisting of twenty-one. Lots are to be cast for the purpose of ascertaining what seven of those twenty-one directors shall go out of office one year from that time, and so on to the end of three years. At present the number of directors of the company as now organized is thirty. The committee have thought it unreasonable that there should be so many. The original bill as it passed the Senate provided for only twenty-one, but it did not happen to provide very specifically for the election next October. That is the first change, to which, I presume, there will be no objection.

The second alteration of the Senate bill consists in this: the committee do not include in the amendment which they now offer to the House bill the clause requiring the payment of the interest of the guaranteed bonds to be made in gold and silver; that clause we strike out and allow the interest on the guaranteed bonds to be paid in the legal-tender notes of the United States, or anything else which is declared to be money; and I understand from some very respectable gentlemen who are connected with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and who are interested in the enterprise, that they will, upon the whole, be content to accept these guaranteed bonds upon the payment of interest in legal-tender notes; they waive their claim for the present to the payment of interest in gold and silver. This will be a very great relief to the United States in the present disturbed state of the currency, and especially at the present moment when gold is at so very high a price.

The third alteration is a merely verbal alteration and does not make any change whatever in the tenor of the bill as it passed the Senate. With this explanation I move that this be substituted for the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to inquire whether the committee in this amendment have included any of the provisions which the Senate struck out of the original bill.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; not one.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a very important bill, and I wish we should all understand it. I was present at the meeting of the committee, but I have not seen the detailed amendment. I understand it is the bill as it passed the Senate previously with the modification that interest is to be paid in paper instead of gold and silver, the modification that there shall be an election next October of all the directors, and that new books shall be opened for the subscription of stock.

Mr. HOWARD. All the other provisions of the bill remain precisely as we passed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The chairman says he has consulted with the parties interested. Has he consulted with the company that has constructed forty miles of the road? Are they willing to accept the bonds with interest payable in legal-tender notes instead of in gold?

Mr. HOWARD. I have not consulted that company.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is the company that is constructing the Kansas branch. That is the only company that has made any portion of the road under the old bill.

Mr. HARLAN. Under the old bill interest is payable in lawful money only and not in gold and silver.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. CLARK. I desire the Senate at some time when it may be convenient—I will not ask for it to delay public business—to give me a little time for a few private bills—which come from the Committee on Claims. ["Agreed!"]

PRIZE PROCEEDINGS.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the bill (H. R. No. 446) to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. In line sixteen of section eight, I move to strike out "marshal" and insert "auctioneer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. In line nineteen of that section I move to strike out "he" and insert "the marshal."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. On page 15, section sixteen, line nine, I move to strike out the word "by" and insert the words "in their accounts with." It now reads:

And the persons entitled to share therein shall be severally credited by the Navy Department with the amounts to which they are respectively entitled.

It should read, "in their accounts with the Navy Department."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. On page 16, section sixteen, line twenty-three, I move to strike out the words "officered, manned, and." It now reads:

Provided, That in case of vessels not of the Navy, but officered, manned, and controlled by any Department of the Government, the whole amount decreed to the captors shall be divided among the ship's company.

It should read, "but controlled by any Department of the Government."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PROPERTY IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States, to report it back to the Senate without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass; and as it is a matter of importance, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to prevent the improper appropriation or occupation of any of the public streets, avenues, squares, or reservations in the city of Washington belonging to the United States, and to reclaim the same if unlawfully appropriated, and particularly to prevent the erection of any permanent building upon any property reserved to or for the use of the United States, unless plainly authorized by act of Congress; and to report to the Congress, at the commencement of its next session, his proceedings in the premises, together with a full statement of all such property, and how and by what authority the same is occupied or claimed. Nothing herein contained is to be construed to interfere with the temporary and proper occupation of any portion of such property, by lawful authority, for the legitimate purposes of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMBOAT MAGNET.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the bill which is the special order of the day, Senate bill No. 171.

Mr. SPRAGUE. With the permission of the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] who has charge of that subject, I will ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 322. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, simply proposing to change the name of a vessel.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 322) to change the name of the steamboat Magnet, of Buffalo, to Home.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIRECT TAXES IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 171) further to amend an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1862, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TEN Eyck to strike out all of the first section of the bill after the enacting clause in the following words:

That in any case in which a sale of lands or tenements has been or shall be made by a board of tax commissioners, appointed pursuant to the act of which this is an amendment, and a certificate of sale issued by the board to the purchaser or purchasers of said lands or tenements, it shall and may be lawful for the tax commissioners to issue, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, a writ, directed to the marshal of the district in which said lands or tenements are situated, commanding him to put the said purchaser or purchasers forthwith into possession of the said lands or tenements, and to make return of his proceedings under the said writ within thirty days to the commissioners, who shall keep a record of their proceedings in the matter, and who may, in case of any failure on the part of the said marshal to execute the first writ, issue alias and pluries writs, as the circumstances may to them seem to require. In case the marshal of the district shall be unable, either by himself or by deputy, to execute such writ, or in case there shall be no marshal of the United States within the said district at the time of the issuing of said writ, the same may be executed and returned by any fit person, to be specially appointed by the said board of tax commissioners for the purpose, which appointment shall be in writing and indorsed on the said writ: Provided, That where the lands or tenements so sold shall, at the time of such sale, be occupied by the United States authorities for hospital or other purposes, the issuing of such writ shall be suspended during such occupancy, and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands or tenements shall be entitled to and receive such rent or compensation for the use of such lands or tenements as the Secretary of the Treasury, under regulations prescribed by him, shall order or direct.

The motion to strike out was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following amendment to come in as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That when any lands, tenements, parcels, or lots of land which have been selected under direction of the President for Government use, or which have been purchased at any sale made by a board of tax commissioners for the United States, have been entered upon by persons claiming preemption rights thereon, with the consent or by the authority of the board of tax commissioners, and in accordance with instructions heretofore issued by the President of the United States, such persons shall be taken and deemed to have acquired rights of preemption in said land; and all certificates that have been issued or that shall hereafter be issued by the said board of commissioners to such persons shall be valid and effectual as though issued pursuant to the act of which this is amendatory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer another amendment to come in as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That boards of tax commissioners shall give such notice by advertisement of sales of lands to be made by them by authority of law as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall order and direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up House bill No. 411, to encourage immigration. It will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that it is necessary to read the bill or the amendment at large. The Senate unanimously passed a bill on this subject at an early stage of the session, which was very maturely considered by the Committee on Agriculture, and sent it to the House. Shortly after that the House passed another bill on the same subject, and sent it to the Senate, the two bills never having been brought in contact with each other. The Committee on Agriculture have reconsidered the whole matter, and we came to the conclusion that the Senate bill as we passed it was all the aid that Congress ought now to render. We propose to strike out the whole of the House bill and insert the Senate bill, which has already received the sanction of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to know what the provisions of the bill are.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be read if desired. It is not very long. The provisions are very simple. The bill has been once acted upon by the Senate. I will state to the Senator that the first section of the bill provides for a Commissioner of Immigration; the second authorizes the Commissioner of Immigration, in order to encourage immigration, to distribute information to the countries from which the immigrants come, and makes an appropriation for that purpose, the whole amount being $50,000 per annum. The bill is on a modest scale to commence with. We believe that the organization of such a bureau might properly facilitate immigration at this time, and probably avoid the difficulties and frauds that are practiced on immigrants.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the reading of the bill desired?

Mr. COWAN. No, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate, before it proceeds to the consideration of that bill, will take up the motion to reconsider the vote passing Senate bill No. 37. There will be no debate upon it at all.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is not now in his seat. I do not think the Senate ought to proceed with that subject in his absence.

Mr. POWELL. I wish to have that motion voted upon. I do not want the bill to be kept here by this motion to reconsider so that if it should finally pass there will be no time for action upon it in the House of Representatives. I suppose the Senator from Michigan is in the Capitol, and can be here in a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. As he is not in his seat I should not deem it right for that motion to be taken up in his absence. I think we can proceed with the bill I have indicated, and with a few amendments that I propose to make bring it to a close.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Foot, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hicks, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, and Saulsbury—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Richardson, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—21.

So the motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

BAIL IN CASES OF MILITARY ARRESTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with that bill I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts to allow me to take up a little bill, by unanimous consent, that will take but a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. If my bill can be passed over informally, without losing its place, I shall have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is Senate bill No. 317, providing for bail in certain cases of military arrests.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported the bill, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That upon all arrests under section sixteen of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, bail shall be allowed, and such bail on demand of the party so arrested may be taken before the chief or any associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the District of Columbia, or of any Territory of the United States, any judge of a district court of the United States, or commissioner of the circuit court authorized to take bail, who shall exercise their discretion therein regarding the nature of the offense and the evidence and usages of law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to offer one or two amendments to the amendment, merely to correct the phraseology, not altering the meaning. In the first line of the amendment I move to strike out the words "all arrests under," and to insert, "the arrest of any contractor charged with the commission of any offense specified in."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In line six, after the word "bail," I move to insert "for his appearance to answer before the court-martial."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That any officer in the executive, military, or naval service of the United States who shall arrest, or cause to be arrested, any person or persons not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and who is not engaged in the rebellion against the United States, shall immediately hand the person or persons so arrested over to the civil authorities to have their case investigated and the parties so arrested tried according to law. Any officer engaged in the executive, naval, or military service of the United States, who shall violate this section shall be deemed guilty of felony, and upon indictment and conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to try and punish such cases, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $10,000, or confined in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to prevent any person who shall make an unlawful arrest from being prosecuted in a civil suit for damages for such unlawful arrest.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate provides that contractors and that description of persons who, by virtue of the statute of 1862, are to be tried by military law, shall be allowed bail. The amendment of that law proposed by the committee I think is very proper. But there is another class of cases that requires, in my opinion, the attention of the Senate. The amendment that I propose requires every officer engaged in the executive, military, or naval service of the United States, when he arrests a citizen, a person who is not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and who is not engaged in the rebellion, to hand him over to the civil authorities to be tried and punished, if found guilty, for his offense. In the event that they refuse to do that they are to be deemed guilty of felony, and are to be indicted, fined, and imprisoned for the offense. We have a law upon our statute-book requiring certain persons who have charge of civilians who have been arrested, to hand them over to the courts, and punishing them with fine and imprisonment if they fail to do so. That alludes to the jailor, the subordinate officer who has the immediate custody of the party; but there is no law punishing your higher officers who order the arrest and who order the imprisonment of those persons for thus confining them. It strikes me as being eminently proper that the officers of this Government when they lay their hands upon a citizen and imprison him should at once hand him over to the civil authorities to have the case investigated, and if he is guilty, let him be tried and punished; if he is innocent, let him go free.

We know, sir, that the officers of this Government have, without any authority of law whatever, arrested persons, thrown them into prison, detained them there for months, and then turned them out without any investigation of the charge against them after keeping them confined such a length of time. That is manifestly wrong. If the officers of the Government arrest one who is not guilty, it is certainly due to the citizen that he should be handed over to the civil tribunals so that he can be tried, and enlarged if innocent. If he is guilty, it is the duty of the officers of the Government to see that he is tried and punished. If, however, the officer fails to prove the accusation, if he makes an unlawful arrest, he ought to be tried as a felon and punished as a felon. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the vote is taken I desire simply to say that we considered the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky has proposed to the bill under consideration in the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he is a member, and we thought it ought not to be adopted. I do not wish to enter into a discussion or to say anything to provoke discussion about it, because it is only by the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts that I have been able to get the bill up. The Senator from Kentucky himself has no objection to the bill which we have reported; in fact, he is in favor of it. I wish we would not insist upon the attempt to put this amendment on the bill, and if he does I trust the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Illinois is very correct when he says this amendment was rejected in the Committee on the Judiciary. It was so rejected. He is also correct when he says I favor the bill as it is. I do. I think the bill as it is eminently proper, but I think this amendment is quite as proper as the bill, and more so. It punishes a class of persons who have been guilty of the most flagrant and unconstitutional outrages upon the right of the citizen, and in my judgment we should adopt it.

The bill reported by the committee had its origin in this: certain persons in the North who were engaged as contractors have been arrested by military authority, those persons having been by virtue of a statute made amenable to military laws; they have been confined; a long time has elapsed; they cannot get out of prison, and there is no law authorizing bail in their cases. This bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, in my judgment very properly allows those parties bail. That is eminently proper; it is in accordance with the spirit of our institutions. But, sir, while we are relieving those persons in the North, who by virtue of the law are liable to be punished by military law, we ought to punish those persons who are constantly, daily, and hourly depriving citizens of their liberty without any authority of law; and that is the object of the amendment that I propose. If any officer of this Government thinks that a citizen has been guilty of any crime, and he chooses by virtue of his office to arrest him, either with or without authority of law, let him hand that man instantly over to the civil authorities and have the case investigated. That is all that the section I propose requires him to do. It says that if he lays his hand upon a citizen and charges him with crime, he shall hand him over to the authorities and let the case be investigated, and let him be punished if he is guilty. No man can say that is not right. If an officer arrests a man and does not thus hand him over to the civil authorities to have his case adjudicated and have him punished if guilty, then the amendment declares that officer to be guilty of a felony, and provides for punishing him accordingly. That is all there is in it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think there has been no more important proposition offered during this session than that covered in the amendment of my colleague. One of the most amazing and incomprehensible matters to me that distinguishes the extraordinary times in which we live is the perfect indifference of the Congress of the United States to the personal rights and liberties of the people, and not only the apathy with which they permit them to be outraged, but the legislation which they are disposed to adopt to encourage these outrages and violations of the personal liberties of the people, and to relieve those who are guilty of such infringements upon the most invaluable rights of the citizen from all punishment or accountability. I repeat, I am amazed at the course of the Congress of the United States in relation to this subject of arbitrary military arrests. We scarcely read a newspaper that does not inform us of some instance of the kind.

I read yesterday an account of the arrest of a citizen of Detroit who was in the city of New York engaged in making purchases probably for a mercantile establishment. He was touched upon the shoulder by a man who slipped up behind him and requested him to go with him. He did so. He had not walked far before he found himself in the presence of a military guard. That guard took him to prison. He demanded to know what offense he had committed, what charges had been preferred against him, under what authority he was arrested and held in imprisonment, and where he was to be taken to. There was no information whatever given him upon any of these points. He was dragged to a distant prison and confined for some time, and then was unlocked and told he might go thence, without a word of explanation in relation to the course that had been taken concerning him for his confinement.

Sir, are we in Russia? Are the free people of the United States in Turkey? Are we in some dark despotic Government where nothing like human liberty or the forms of law which protect human liberty and the existence of courts and the administration of justice according to law prevail? It would seem so. There is not a man who hears my voice, who has two ideas of law and constitutional liberty, but what will concede that such conduct as that is such an outrage upon any citizen as that that citizen is authorized instantly to slay the man who is guilty of it. Why, sir, the rights of personal liberty, the great rights that distinguish either general or perfect or qualified liberty in any country, are more respected, are asserted with more independence, are enforced with a more regular administration of the law in England by all odds than they are in the United States since the commencement of this rebellion. I will read a passage from an argument of Lord Denman, late Chief Justice of England, bearing upon these points. He said:

"He believed that all Westminster Hall, including the judicial bench, were unanimous in holding the opinion expressed by the noble earl?"

Alluding to a speech of the Earl of Aberdeen, then British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the subject—

"and that, in this country, there was no right of delivering up, indeed no means of securing persons accused of crimes committed in foreign countries. The matter was under discussion frequently when the alien bill had been year after year before the House of Commons, and the lawyers of all parties had come to the same conclusion."

"Nor were these opinions confined to the lawyers of Europe; great lawyers of America, men distinguished by their profound erudition, whose decisions are so highly respected among us, and whose valuable works on great legal questions are studied and consulted in this country with the highest advantage, held the same doctrine. Indeed,

"Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries on American Law, (1836) appears to incline to the opinion of Grotius and Vattel, against that of other eminent jurists, that persons accused of crimes ought to be delivered up to the country where they are accused, and one case appears to have been decided by himself when he held his office in conformity with that doctrine. But it may be remarked that the peculiar constitution of a federal Government, comprehending many States with various laws, renders any decision, however respectable, of less extensive application, at least till all the particular provisions existing when it was made are fully canvassed. But Justice Story in his more recent edition of the Conflict of Laws, (1841) concludes a discussion on this subject by citing the passage from Lord Coke, adding, in terms, one chief justice in America has adhered to the same doctrine in a very elaborate judgment; that the reasoning of another chief justice, in a leading case, leads to the same conclusion, and that it stands indirectly confirmed by a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a very recent case of the deepest interest.²

"Therefore, although distinguished jurists may feel a desire for some arrangement for the surrender of foreign criminals, it would seem that the municipal law of America rests on the same principles as our own, which, as he had already stated, recognized no right and provided no machinery by which the subjects of another State seeking refuge here could be given up to the country to which they belonged."

The argument was made in a case involving the right to seize a criminal in England who was the citizen of another country, and to surrender him up. But here are some general principles that bear upon the points now in debate:

"He had, therefore, come prepared respectfully to warn Secretaries of State, if it had not been rendered unnecessary by what had passed, that they could not seize or detain aliens seeking refuge here without subjecting themselves to actions for damages for false imprisonment, and without further incurring the risk of a still heavier and more awful responsibility; for if a man attempted to seize an alien under such authority he might resist, and if death ensued he would be justified in inflicting it, while those who ordered his arrest and detention would be liable to be tried for murder. He agreed with his noble and learned friend that the comity of nations might be properly employed in considering of treaties and laws which would allow nations to seize and give up to each other their respective criminals. But this could only be done on the supposition that the laws of all nations should be reasonable and just, for no country could be justified in enforcing those laws which it believed to be founded on injustice, oppression, and cruelty. Some few great criminals had possibly been given up without notice; but he believed that the United States of America had refused to give up an English subject charged with forgery, because they disapproved of the punishment of death for that crime, and until the internal law of all countries was such that each would have no objection to adopt it, he feared that this desirable object could not be accomplished. He indulged a hope that those distinguished persons, the judges and jurists in America, who had been referred to, would, in common with those of other countries, apply their minds to these considerations."

That is the law of England pronounced by the Chief Justice and administered uniformly and rigorously in a country whose Government we condemn as despotic. That principle is stated by Lord Chief Justice Denman.

Mr. SUMNER. Was it not Justice Hobart the other day?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; Chief Justice Denman.

Mr. SUMNER. It is not a recent decision.

Mr. DAVIS. It was made a few years ago. He is a recent judge, as we all know, of one of the highest courts of judicature in England. What does he lay down the law of England now to be? That if a foreigner, such as Arguelles, is seized by an officer of the law in England without authority, he may resist the arrest to the point of slaying the man who attempts to arrest him, although he is a regular officer of the law, and if in his attempt to resist he is himself slain, the officer of the law stands guilty of the crime of murder. That is the law not only of England but of this country.

What is the amendment offered by my colleague? It is this, that where a man who is not subject to military arrest or to be tried by military courts is arrested, those who make the arrest shall be held to commit a felony. Is there any act, any wrong, any outrage which one citizen can offer to the person or to the rights of another that ought to be more sternly characterized as a felony and punished as such than that? Why, sir, our Constitution provides expressly the cases in which courts-martial shall have jurisdiction; and they are cases that arise in the military or naval service of the United States or in the militia when the militia is in the service of the United States. In every other case or class of cases where any provost marshal, any military man clothed with a little brief authority, attempts to make an arrest, he is not only guilty of an infraction of the personal rights of the party whom he attempts to arrest, but he is flagitiously guilty of violating one of the most important liberties guaranteed by the Constitution to the citizen; and all the authorities of our own country and of England establish the position and the principle that the man who is thus about to be arrested may resist, and if it be necessary for him to prevent the arrest he may resist to the point of slaying the party who attempts to make the arrest; that if a scuffle, an encounter, ensues, and the party attempted to be arrested is slain in the contest, the party who is thus attempting illegally to make the arrest is guilty of the crime of murder.

We had a famous case in the State of Ohio not long ago. A gentleman, formerly a distinguished member of the other House, for the use of language in a speech, which was no violation, which amounted to no crime or no offense, was seized in his own domicile in the dead hour of the night by a military posse sent for the purpose by a general in the service of the United States, against law, in violation of the Constitution, dragged before a military court, tried by military law, and a sentence of banishment entered up against him, and that sentence put in the course of execution. Sir, there was not a step in the proceeding against Vallandigham that was not an outrage upon his political rights, his liberties, and his rights of person secured to him by the Constitution of the United States. If he had had the physical power—and before Heaven I wish he had had the physical power—to resist those who arrested him in his own house, his own castle, and to strike them low in the dust, he would have been perfectly justifiable in doing so. The men who arrested him, the men who tried him, the men who sentenced him to banishment, the men who aided in carrying that sentence into execution, were all trespassers and criminals; they were guilty of a conspiracy; they were guilty of acts of lawless violence that would have fully justified him, if he had had the physical means, in slaying the whole of them, and he would have stood upon his proper and full legal defense for such acts if that had been the result before any independent court in the United States.

Everything of the kind must come to an end, and I think this course of military tyranny and military despotism has about run out. If it has not, then the people are ready to bow their heads in abject slavery and allow the iron heel of every little military despot to trample their necks to the dust. But, sir, the people are beginning to know their rights, their constitutional rights, their rights of resistance against oppression and tyranny and military despotism. They are awaking to the importance of vindicating these great principles of human liberty. This Congress by passing the amendment of my colleague would create a statutory provision that would have the effect of restraining the lawless oppression, the outrageous tyranny of the military authorities of this country, and in that way would avert the occasions and the causes of that violent but just and constitutional resistance to which the people will eventually be driven, and which will result in a general scene of blood and carnage and violence, authorized by the Constitution on the part of the people to prevent themselves from being enslaved by a military despotism.

Mr. HARLAN. I have listened from day to day to these denunciations of the Government on this subject, and I wish now not to enter into an examination of the constitutional right to make these arrests, but to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that in the very case he cites to illustrate the enormity of which he complains, there was an appearance before a Federal judge. In the case of Vallandigham of Ohio, the question of the right to make the arrest was raised before the judge of the southern district of the State of Ohio, and he was heard by an eminent lawyer of the State of Ohio, formerly a member of this body. The question of the right to make the arrest was raised before the court, and the court decided that the President had the right to make the arrest, and there is the end of the whole thing.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] says that the question was then brought to the Supreme Court of the United States here at Washington, and the Supreme Court decided that they had no right to interfere with the arrest. Now what comes of all these long speeches on the subject? It is the Senator from Kentucky against the judiciary of the United States, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. DAVIS. One word in reply to the honorable Senator from Iowa. I think he is utterly mistaken—at least that is my recollection—in the statement that the judge of the southern district of Ohio decided the question. On the contrary, if I recollect aright, he expressly refused to decide the question; but if he had decided it, the party against whom he decided it would have been entitled to appeal to a higher court. But I deny, so far as I know or believe, that there is any respectable court in America that has ever decided that a civilian, disconnected with the Army or Navy of the United States, is liable to arbitrary military arrest without a warrant charging a legal offense. Sir, when that principle is decided our liberties are gone; they are struck down. I believe that the rights and liberties that were violated in the person of Vallandigham are a thousand fold more important to the people of the United States than the subjection of the rebel States and their retention in the Union, and of Massachusetts thrown in. If these great cardinal, essential rights of person for which all government is formed, and which were intended to be secured by the Constitution, are to be struck down in this way, our Government is not worth the parchment upon which it is written.

Gentlemen may sneer now, but there are many ups and downs in this life, and the time may come when the tables will be turned upon them. If this war had been made against Mr. Buchanan when he was in power, and the very measures and usurpations that characterize the party now in power had been adopted by him and his friends, there is not one of these gentlemen, in my opinion, but what would have stood up in uncompromising opposition to them, and they ought to stand up against them. Sir, I am for preserving the Constitution and the great rights and liberties which it secures to the people against all parties, against all factions, against Republicans or Democrats or Whigs, and against every power that would infringe those rights and liberties. If it be right for these arrests to be made, there is no harm in submitting the question of their regularity and validity to the courts. The courts are the proper tribunal to try the question. All that my colleague asks, all that I would desire myself would be that the way should be open for these questions to be taken to the courts with the highest intelligence and jurisdiction, and there be decided for the regulation of military officers and for the protection of the citizen generally.

Mr. HARLAN. The question has been decided. The President suspended the right to the writ of habeas corpus. The arrest was made because that right had been suspended by the President of the United States under the provision of the Constitution of the United States giving to this Government the right to suspend it. It was denied that he had the right to suspend it. An arrest had been made of a man of the name of Vallandigham in Ohio. He alleged that the President had no right to suspend the writ, and attempted to sue out a writ before the Federal court, the district judge of the southern district of the State of Ohio, raising the question of the right of the President to suspend the writ. The party having Vallandigham in custody pleaded the action of the President in the premises under the Constitution of the United States, and the question was thus raised of the right of the President to suspend the writ and permit these arrests to take place; and the judge decided the question distinctly that he had no right to issue a writ of habeas corpus on the demand of a citizen because the President of the United States, exercising his constitutional prerogative, had suspended the right to sue out such a writ. The fact had escaped my observation, but my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] tells me, and I have no doubt it is true, that the question was then brought from that tribunal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the district judge in the decision that he made.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me, it was not brought as an appeal from that judge, but the case was brought up at the last session of the court, and the court ruled, as the court has always ruled, that it had no power to revise the action of a military commission or of a court-martial. They are just as much acknowledged as the courts by the whole legislation of Congress and by the action of the President. During Mr. Jefferson's administration Congress passed a law of that kind, and Jefferson's name is attached to it. All the decisions of the courts and the whole action of the Government recognize courts-martial and military commissions as a part of the law of the country in the country, and it goes with every vessel of the country wherever it goes over the globe.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I suppose an application was made for a writ of mandamus from the Supreme Court of the United States to compel the judge of the district court for the southern district of Ohio to issue a writ of habeas corpus; and thus the question, I apprehend, was raised here; that would be the regular mode of raising it; and the Supreme Court decided in effect that he had ruled correctly, that the President had constitutionally suspended the writ of habeas corpus, or the right to sue it out in that case; and there is the whole of it.

I apprehend these speeches are made merely for political effect, and I will remind the Senator from Kentucky, if so, the question has been decided before the populace. That question was raised in the State of Ohio, and the freemen of Ohio decided by a majority of more than one hundred thousand that the judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio ruled rightly and that Vallandigham was properly arrested; so that the people have decided in Ohio as well as the judiciary of that, the proper district, and the supreme judiciary of the United States.

All of these questions are raised for mere clap-trap. I can hardly believe that the Senator himself is serious. He may, however, argue himself into a serious mood, because I know he has said here on the floor of the Senate that he considers there are two great evils in this country: one, the lesser evil, is the rebellion headed by Jeff. Davis; the other, and the greater evil, is the existence of this Administration. He is desirous of putting them both down, but as the greater one is nearer home and more pressing he is more anxious to put it down; he is more desirous to crush out the Administration than he is to crush out the rebellion; and hence the facility with which he argues himself into a serious mood when he is discussing these questions which are intended to affect the minds of the people at home.

I suppose these questions have been passed over by the majority of the Senate, not because there is not a sufficient answer to the whole of them, but because the time of the Senate has been occupied with the practical legislation necessary to carry on the machinery of the Government. When the proper time comes for further discussion, I notify the Senator that all these cavils will be answered fully hereafter as they have been heretofore, to the satisfaction of the people of this country. These questions were raised on the stump all over the loyal States last year, and what was the result? Overwhelming majorities in favor of the course pursued by the Administration; and I do not risk anything in predicting that this will be the result at the approaching election.

Mr. DAVIS. I read the opinion of Judge Leavitt on the application of Vallandigham, and I deny that he made any such decision as the Senator from Iowa states. He merely declined to act in the premises, when it was his duty to have issued a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, that was the very point. He decided that it was not his duty to do so. If the arrest had been made improperly and unconstitutionally it would have been his duty to do so, but he decided it was not his duty to do so in the case raised, and hence the inference follows irresistibly that the arrest was constitutionally made.

Mr. DAVIS. The judge did not decide the question at all. On the contrary he expressly waived a decision of the question. I controvert the position, taken by whom it may be, that any respectable court in America has ever decided that a military arrest of a civilian may take place without a warrant charging an offense. It never has been done, and it never will be done. All the decisions in England are to the contrary, and all the decisions in this country are to the contrary, so far as I have read.

The Senator from Iowa says that the question was made before the people of Ohio and decided against Mr. Vallandigham. Well, sir, if it was made and decided every year for ages, it is so important a principle that there would be an appeal from one year to another, and from the people acting this year to those acting hereafter through ages and centuries until such a despotic principle was overthrown. I deny that a man who is not in the Army, not subject to military law of any kind, can be arrested, without warrant, without any charge of crime or offense, taken (against the express provision of the Constitution) from the district in which offense was charged to have been committed, taken to a distant community, immured in a dungeon, tried by a petty court-martial, and be deprived of having the charges preferred against him and a presentment for his trial upon them, be deprived of trial by jury, be deprived of the intervention of a civil court administering the civil law, he deprived of every vital constitutional right in trials of this kind secured to him by the charter of our liberties. Neither the Senator from Iowa nor any other Senator can adduce a case in which all these rights and privileges of a party under trial have been violated in which a court has held that he was properly deprived of them because he was arrested by military order.

Sir, the provision of the Constitution guaranteeing those rights is in the form of an amendment. It was proposed by Massachusetts herself, in nearly the terms in which it is incorporated in that instrument. There is no more invaluable, inappreciable right which a freeman can enjoy in a country that pretends to liberty than to have a trial according to Magna Charta and according to the amendments to the Constitution. It is because the conduct of these military men clothed with a little brief and accidental authority strikes down all of these important, vital, constitutional rights, without which Government would be a farce and would not be worth the money to keep it up from day to day it is because of these wrongs and outrages that are perpetrated with impunity from day to day that the Congress of the United States ought to legislate for the redress of such wrongs and such oppressions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to prolong this debate unless Senators desire to press a vote on this amendment. If they do I will say what I have to say in regard to the case of Mr. Vallandigham which has been referred to.

Mr. WILSON. I think we had better settle this question now as we have got it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say to the Senator from Ohio I had no expectation of this debate on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give way to the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires to go on with the other bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was in hopes of getting a vote on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have carefully read the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. The general principle of constitutional law proclaimed by both the Senators from Kentucky is not disputed by any member of the Senate; that is, every man has a right to a fair trial before a jury of his peers in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. That is a right so sacred that our ancestors five hundred years ago engaged in civil war to enforce it; and I think the people of this country would, if necessary, engage in another civil war to maintain it. When the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] endeavors to frame a criminal code for the purpose of preventing military officers from making improper arrests, he recognizes what I believe to be the true principle. If a person simply talks against the constituted authorities, simply arraigns them, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] does every day in the most violent language, as long as he confines himself to words in debate, although they are violent, entirely too violent for a deliberative body, no one can stop him; he is simply exercising a constitutional right in an intemperate way. But, sir, there is one thing which no man can be allowed to do, either in a free Government or in a despotic Government; and that is, he must not render direct and positive aid to a public enemy engaged in war. This is a principle the Senator will not controvert, and the only difficulty is in drawing the line between excusable abuse of the Government and actual aid to a public enemy.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not answer any questions, because I wish to get through. I will state briefly my points. It is too late now to enter into a general discussion.

I repeat, sir, that no man in this country, however free we claim to be, can be allowed to do any act that will aid the public enemy. I do not speak now of free discussion, mere talk or personal or party railings. The people of Ohio understood the distinctions I name just as well as the Senator from Kentucky can state them; and they recognized this principle: that when any citizen of Ohio or of any other portion of the United States engaged in acts of hostility against the Government of the United States, by aiding a public enemy either in a civil or foreign war, that person subjected himself to the military authorities to be punished by military law; and that was the principle applied to the case of Mr. Vallandigham.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope I shall not be interrupted. I believe this is the first time I have alluded to this subject of military arrests in the Senate, and I prefer to close without question.

This is the distinction. If the act of the accused tends to aid the public enemy, was intended to aid the public enemy; was designed and entered into with the purpose of aiding the public enemy in a time of war, he is guilty of a military offense to be punished by military law. This whole matter was discussed in the canvass in Ohio last year by lawyers, by judges, and by all classes of citizens. The arrest of Mr. Vallandigham was justified by me and by others who engaged in that discussion, solely on this ground, that he did, with intent to aid the public enemy, go to a neighborhood where actual resistance to the constituted authorities had sprung up and engaged in a combination to aid the public enemy in time of war. Mr. Vallandigham had gone over the State of Ohio and had made speeches much more violent even than those made in this Senate Chamber—speeches which he had a right to make. He had, from the time this war was entered into, opposed the war, engaged in all kinds of opposition to the war, denounced the constituted authorities, denounced every man engaged in upholding the authority of the Government. He did it in the other House; he did it wherever he raised his voice, and no one interfered with him. He exercised the freedom of speech as much as any man could or dare, as much even as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] has done over and over again, and as he has a right to do although we differ with him. Mr. Vallandigham had exercised without objection or restraint all the right of opposition to this Government that one man could exercise; but when he took that one step further, then he was arrested by the military authority. I say here, Mr. President, that in the judgment of the people of Ohio Mr. Vallandigham did take that step, he did with intent to aid the public enemy go to a place near by where resistance to the constituted authorities had assumed the form of riot and open resistance, and there engaged in acts directly aiding the public enemy. His acts it is said were mere words, but they were words directly connected with and tending to open resistance, and were as much acts of war as the words of an officer, unarmed though he might be, who incited a military force to assault a work or fight a battle.

Those were the things for which Mr. Vallandigham was arrested. Mr. Vallandigham violated even this proposition, because the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky upon which he wishes us to vote contains this provision:

That any officer in the executive, military, or naval service of the United States who shall arrest or cause to be arrested any person or persons not engaged in the military or naval service and who is not engaged in the rebellion against the United States, shall immediately hand the person or persons so arrested over to the civil authorities, &c.

Now, Mr. President, for the Senator from Kentucky to say that no man not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States can be arrested by the military authority is an absurdity. Upon that principle you could not arrest an open rebel, because he was not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States; you could not arrest a spy who was actually engaged in open war. Why, sir, under and by the military authority in time of war you have the right to arrest any man engaged in aiding this PUBLIC ENEMY. These words are clearly defined by our Constitution and laws; not that aid which violent talk and declamation makes, because a man may utter vile words if he chooses against the constituted authorities even in time of war; but when he aims the public enemies with intent to contribute to and promote their cause, he is liable to be arrested by the military authorities; and if this aid is rendered during war he may be tried and punished by military law and tribunals. The constitutional provisions in favor of the trial of traitors only applies when the hostile force is overthrown or has been abandoned.

What were the alleged facts in the case of Mr. Vallandigham?

Before proceeding to state them, however, I ought to say that in my judgment there have been cases of arrest in the United States which were not justified either by the Constitution or the laws; and I never will, my party relations or any other obligation to the contrary, seek to justify an open infraction of the Constitution and laws of the country. I believe there have been foolish arrests made; and I have said so over and over again. Latterly there have been very few, and when the cases have been examined they have generally come within the rule of law which justifies the military authorities in making the arrests.

What is the case of Mr. Vallandigham? A riot had sprung up in the county of Holmes in the State of Ohio. The militia were called out to suppress the riot, and the men engaged in it were arrested and indicted by the civil authorities, and were then held arraigned for trial for the crime of treason, for open resistance to the laws of the United States, to the execution of the conscription law. Under these circumstances, Mr. Vallandigham went to the adjoining county where a large company of people had been gathered, and among them some of the very men engaged in this riot, and there he made a speech tending and directly inciting them to armed resistance against the authority of the United States. There, in the presence of men who were under indictment for treason, he used language the plain tendency of which, although cunningly covered up by words, as construed by any fair-minded, patriotic man, was advice to engage in armed resistance to the authorities of the United States. This language was used in the presence of excited men who had been engaged in this resistance, and who were then under indictment—the very language that a demagogue would use to stir up civil war in a community. Does the Senator from Kentucky say that in time of war we have no power to prevent these things?

There would have been no objection to Mr. Vallandigham or any one else engaging in the ordinary political discussion of the country. He had been all over the country engaging in those discussions; but when you take into consideration the surrounding circumstances, when you take the intent, when you take the obvious meaning of his words, the obvious effect of his words upon an excited audience, some of whom themselves had been engaged in treason, it was a plain and palpable commission of a military offense for which he was liable to military trial. If a spy should come from the southern States into the State of Ohio and go around among our peaceful communities stirring up resistance to the laws, would the military authorities be compelled to wait the slow process of civil tribunals? Not at all. The military authorities have a right to seize upon any one who is engaged in resistance to them; and this principle of law is laid down even by Lord Mansfield, who was said to be the guardian of liberty. It is laid down in the English law-books; it is laid down in books on international law; it is plainly stated by General Halleck; it is laid down in every book on the laws of war. Any man who throws obstacles in the way of the constituted authorities in prosecuting war, either civil or foreign, is liable to be arrested and suppressed (if I may use the expression) by the military authorities. That is laid down as a principle of law, and it is a correct one.

General Burnside, having full information of this matter, having the report of a man who attended the meeting and took down short-hand notes of the speech of Mr. Vallandigham and the circumstances by which he was surrounded, ordered his arrest, and, to prevent any disturbance, the arrest was made at night. He was brought to Cincinnati. He was cared for with the greatest humanity. It was complained of that the arrest was made at night. Was not that advisable under the circumstances to prevent a mob, a riot, or a civil war? The very mob that Mr. Vallandigham had stirred up to resist the constituted authorities might have exposed their lives in the unholy cause of preventing a legal arrest. He was arrested by the military authority. He was taken to Cincinnati. There he was kept, and a commission was organized, composed, I believe, of thirteen members, every one of whom, if I remember correctly, belonged to the political party to which Mr. Vallandigham belonged. Some of them were officers of high rank in the regular Army, of unblemished character and unblemished reputation, men who had no party feeling in the matter, or if they had any it was against what was called the Republican party. Mr. Vallandigham was taken before this tribunal. All the forms of a military trial were gone through with. Witnesses were brought up and examined before the court. Mr. Vallandigham was asked if he had any rebutting witnesses. He had the benefit of able counsel. My predecessor on this floor (Mr. Pugh) appeared in his behalf. The whole matter was investigated and gone over before this military tribunal. They gave him a fair and impartial military examination, and they reported him guilty of the written charges against him. I am sorry I have not the papers before me so that I could lay the case more fully before the Senate.

Then Mr. Vallandigham expressed a desire to have the case brought before the courts of the United States. He had three tribunals or judges open to him. He might have gone to Chief Justice Taney in Baltimore and presented his case to him by an application for a writ of habeas corpus; he might have gone to Judge Swayne, then in Columbus, Ohio, and one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have had the case brought before him; but he took Judge Leavitt, who was the judge of the district court for the southern district of the State of Ohio, the district in which Mr. Vallandigham lived. I ask Senators whether there was anything in the antecedents or character of Judge Leavitt that would make him hostile to Mr. Vallandigham and friendly to the Administration? As is well known, Judge Leavitt was appointed by Andrew Jackson; he had been a judge for thirty years; he held an office for life, beyond the power or control of any man. Mr. Vallandigham selected this judge to try the question whether he was legally held by the constituted military authorities.

I need not tell the Senator from Kentucky that the only question before Judge Leavitt was, whether or not Mr. Vallandigham was legally held? On a writ of habeas corpus, or an application for one, there is no other question except this, is the cause of commitment legal? If it was illegal, Judge Leavitt was bound by his oath of office, by the sacred obligations of the Constitution of the United States, to discharge him.

Mr. Vallandigham, then, had a fair trial before a judge of his own selection; an old, able, and experienced man, beyond the power of the President, beyond the power of the people; a man who, from his position, was as free from prejudice or party bias as any human being can be. Counsel were heard for and against him. Mr. Perry, an able lawyer, spoke in behalf of the Government, and Mr. Pugh made in behalf of Mr. Vallandigham a very able and eloquent speech, in which he cited all the English and American authorities to bear upon the subject. The case was put upon this ground by Mr. Perry: that Mr. Vallandigham was held for actually aiding the public enemy in a time of war, and was therefore to be adjudged by the military and not by the civil authority. The question was argued at great length, and Judge Leavitt gave his opinion after full consideration, and that opinion covers the whole ground in the case. If I had it before me I should be glad to read an extract from it; but it goes to the extent, first, that he has no power to supervise the examination of the military tribunals, and next that Mr. Vallandigham was legally held upon the charges made before the military tribunal, and the judge goes on to say substantially that upon the facts stated he had no inclination to discharge him from that custody.

The military tribunal decided that Mr. Vallandigham, for the safety of the country, ought to be put in a military prison. That was the only way in which a military court could properly enforce its sentence. If the facts justified it, he might have been sentenced to be shot, or he might have been put in a military prison, subject, however, to the supervision of the President of the United States. This military court, after the full hearing that I have mentioned, decided that he should be confined in one of the military prisons of the United States during the existence of the present rebellion.

The case then came on to the President of the United States. It was examined by him; and I am informed was fully and fairly considered by the Attorney General. There was no real doubt about the legality of the trial or the legality of these proceedings; but the President of the United States, with a humanity that sometimes is his weakness, although he is so bitterly denounced by his opponents, varied his sentence and ordered him to be taken beyond our military lines into the presence of the men whom he was aiding. That was the result of it.

He has recently come back among us. I have no doubt he will be allowed to remain there, unless he should again violate that law which declares that no citizen of the United States shall aid a public enemy in a time of war. If he does violate that law, I say to Senators there will be power enough in this Government to put him down by the same authority precisely that we will put down Jeff. Davis and all the armed conspirators who are now fighting against the Government of the United States.

The Senator from Kentucky will mark that I draw a broad and deep line of distinction between the man who aids a public enemy and the man who only talks opposition to the Government. The latter ought to be encouraged, although it may sometimes be carried to excess. Free speech is the great safety of a free community, and where a man is arrested simply for exercising his right of free discussion, although it is carried on intemperately, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that it is a gross offense that ought to be punished by the civil courts; but where a man goes beyond this free discussion, beyond this opposition to administrative measures, beyond the simple denunciation of the authorities, and actually aids the public enemy in a time of war, by stirring up riots, by acting as a spy, by shouldering a musket, or in any other way, he ought to be punished not only by the civil but by the military authorities, because, in a time of war, this kind of an offense, where it amounts to something more than talking, is not sufficiently redressed by the slow process of the civil courts. They are made for times of peace. They are made to punish men who violate the civil laws. They are not made for men who engage in an armed rebellion, or in a war against their country. Upon those men the military authorities have the undoubted right to enforce military law.

The only doubt there can be in the case of Mr. Vallandigham is this: whether his speech at Mount Vernon, made under the circumstances that I have narrated, made with the intent that was found against him by the military authorities, amounted to a military or a civil offense. Upon that point we have the judgment, first, of General Burnside, who thought it was a military offense; next, we have the judgment of an impartial military tribunal, who thought it was a military offense and so considered it; next, we have the judgment of Judge Leavitt, one of the purest and ablest of the judges of our country, a man who was never denounced by any party until after this event, a man who took his seat on the judicial bench and performed the judicial function with a purity of character and with an independence that no man can challenge. Besides that, you have the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States and the President of the United States. You have the opinion of all these concurring authorities, that this trial of Mr. Vallandigham was for a military offense, committed in aid of the public enemy in time of war; and you have nothing against it except the party clamor of dissatisfied men, who wish to make something out of that inherent love of human liberty which is implanted in the heart of every American citizen. They wish to make this man, engaged in

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 207.

aiding the public enemy, a patriot, a man who is persecuted for his opinion's sake. Senators, I tell you there was nothing of the kind in this case. The case of Mr. Vallandigham was for a military crime in aid of a public enemy and not a mere civil wrangle against the authorities.

Mr. President, I trust that the military authorities will never have occasion to arrest men in the northern States or in the States where the enemy is not in open force. If I had any power in the matter I would forbear a great way before I would arrest any one not wearing the uniform of the rebels or engaged directly in the presence of the enemy. But as a principle of law it cannot be denied that where a man aids a public enemy in the presence of a civil war, or under circumstances which make him an actual contributor to that civil war, the President is bound to arrest him and to try him by military authority.

Mr. SAULSBURY obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator from Delaware allow me five minutes?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. No one will deny that any man who places himself in military array against his Government while he is found in that position is liable to be shot down by the army that is operating for the Government. No one will deny that any third man who is present giving aid and comfort to a man who is thus making war against the Government is liable to be shot down just like the man who is making the war himself. I concede all that; but I have recently read the speech of Mr. Vallandigham, and, according to my recollection, it is not obnoxious to the exceptions taken to it by the honorable Senator from Ohio.

I differ from the honorable Senator in my recollection of another fact. My recollection is that Judge Leavitt did not decide that the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham was legal and constitutional. I will not put up my recollection on that point against that of the honorable Senator, but I think if he will recur to the opinion rendered by Judge Leavitt on that occasion he will find that Judge Leavitt decided that it was not a case in which he was authorized to issue a writ of habeas corpus, because it was a military arrest and the party was in the custody of the military authorities. It struck me at the time that his excuse was wholly insufficient, that it was not based upon any correct principle, and that he ought not to have hesitated at once to intervene the great writ of liberty, the writ of habeas corpus, and have Vallandigham brought up before him there to investigate upon the legality and the sufficiency of the cause of his imprisonment.

I was disposed to ask my honorable friend from Ohio, but he conceded it in effect, if it was legitimate in this country to oppose the measures of an Administration? Is it legitimate in this country to question the policy, the wisdom, the justice, or the constitutionality of the measures of a President or of his party? Some men seem to occupy the negative of that position strenuously and uncompromisingly; but the honorable Senator from Ohio conceded the principle, and very properly. Why, sir, how else can a mischievous, unconstitutional, wicked Administration, whose measures are destructive of popular liberty, be overthrown than by the most perfect freedom in the investigation of its measures? That is one of the great rights and liberties of the people of the United States that are guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and that is a right and liberty which I contend for, and for nothing beyond. But, sir, here is a provision that was offered as an amendment to the Constitution by the State of Massachusetts, or this branch of it at least, which State offered some of the wisest and most valuable amendments to that instrument that were considered by the Congress and the various conventions of the States, and adopted as parts of the Constitution:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Here is the proposition upon which the honorable Senator and myself differ: I deny that any man can be held amenable to a military court or by martial law unless he comes within the definition which I have just read from the Constitution. Every man charged with an offense who is outside of the reasonable and sensible scope of those words of the Constitution is not amenable to military law or military courts at all. I say to my honorable friend that if he will review the speech for which Vallandigham was arraigned, tried, and convicted, he will find that the words which he uttered contained no offense violative of the laws of the United States, or of the State of Ohio, and that that language did not bring him into the category of adhering to the enemies of the country, giving them aid and comfort. Whenever the words are scrutinized they will be found, in my humble judgment, to fall far short of that mark. If that question of law was submitted to the courts in Westminster Hall, or to the judges of the Supreme Court free from prejudice, or to the enlightened judges of any State court, in my opinion they would unanimously decide in favor of the position that I have assumed.

The principle which I laid down was simply this: Vallandigham was not in the military or naval service of the United States; he was not in the militia in the service of the United States; he was not engaged in open war against the United States. All the words that he uttered fell far short of adhering to the enemies of his country, giving them aid and comfort. My honorable friend will allow me to state this further position: if a person by words gives the enemies of his country aid and comfort, it is not a military offense unless it is committed by a man who is in the military or naval service, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war. If it is committed by a man who does not belong to either of those classes of service, it is but a civil offense, and he is, by the express language of the Constitution, exempt from trial for it before a military tribunal, and he is to be tried according to the forms and the course of the common law. That is the law, and when that principle of law is struck down, liberty expires. I deny, in opposition to the point of the Senator from Iowa, that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus authorizes a military arrest of a man not in the military service.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply say that the question of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus did not enter into this case at all. The writ of habeas corpus was not suspended in the State of Ohio, but Mr. Vallandigham was treated just like any other enemy who had committed acts of hostility against the United States, precisely as if Jeff. Davis had come into the State of Ohio and attempted to stir up insurrection among us, carrying out the general purpose and intent of the rebellion. It was not put on the ground of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus at all.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I was combating a position assumed by the honorable and learned Senator from Iowa, that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus authorized a military arrest. I deny that position wholly. The only effect of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is to deny to the party who sues it out the benefit of that informal and summary trial which it is the great object and purpose of that writ to give him, and it deprives him of no other right or privilege whatever. It gives no additional power against him except to withhold from him that writ. He is not subject to military arrest; he is not subject to be seized except by a warrant charging crime, sued out upon oath; he is not deprived of his right to have the charge against him furnished to him; he is not deprived of the right of being confronted with the witnesses against him face to face; he is not deprived of the right of trial by jury; he is not deprived of the benefit of counsel; he is deprived of one sole, single, solitary right, and that is the right to have a writ of habeas corpus sued out for his immediate and summary trial, and that is all that he is deprived of.

I assume that any man who is not in the military or naval service of the United States or in the militia, who is about to be arrested by the military in this way, even though he has committed murder or any other heinous crime, has the perfect constitutional right to resist such an illegal and unconstitutional arrest. All the courts of England have so decided in every case in which the question ever came up. It is the law here, and it is an express provision of our Constitution, that he shall be exempt from such an arrest, and that is the uniform judgment of that principle of law which our courts have rendered. Each and every one of all the men who have thus been arrested during this war, by the plain reading and meaning of the Constitution and by the principle of liberty as it has been sustained by the English and American courts, had the right to resist such an arrest to the death of the party who attempted to make it, and if the party attempting to make the arrest persists and slays the party sought to be arrested, he commits murder, and would be punished by an independent and enlightened court and jury as a murderer. In my judgment there is no man read even in the horn-book of the law who can controvert these positions.

I know how impatient gentlemen are at having their party chief questioned, or their line of policy questioned; but this thing of human reason and human judgment and conclusion resolves itself very much into this alternate proposition: was it my ox that was gored by your bull or was it your ox that was gored by my bull? Whenever the assailant is changed, and these men are placed upon the defensive, if I then live and have the faculty of speech, and they resist the enforcement of the same abuses or usurpations of power that may then be attempted to be enforced against them by any dominating power or party that may have got into power, they will find me arrayed with them shoulder to shoulder, and I will resist with the same zeal and with whatever little ability I have, if I then possess it, the outrage upon their rights and their constitutional liberties that may be perpetrated by the Democratic party in power, the Whig party in power, or any other party in power. I go for the Constitution of my country; I go for the great personal rights of liberty which it guarantees to the citizen. That cause I have sworn to support, and I shall go forward to the end of life that remains to me and support it, totally reckless of all the consequences that may come to me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is a bill providing for bail in certain cases of military arrests. My friend from Kentucky proposes an amendment to it providing that the person so arrested shall be taken immediately before a judge. It is an amendment designed to secure the personal liberty of the citizen. I shall vote for it; but I shall vote for it with some hesitation, simply because it seems to recognize by implication the validity of the arrest. If this was a bill to authorize any man not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States who was arrested to shoot down upon the instant the man that should attempt to arrest him it would do my soul good to vote for it; because of all the outrages that have ever been perpetrated in this country upon the rights of free American citizens, of all the violations of the Constitution of the United States, of all the violations of the principles of civil liberty, of all the crimes that have gone up from earth to heaven to invoke the vengeance of Almighty God, this crime of arbitrarily and without due process of law arresting quiet, peaceful citizens and dragging them from their homes is the greatest. Sir, I mean to speak what I feel. I would welcome any thunderbolt, whether it came from heaven or from hell, that should strike to the earth any power which, in violation of the chartered rights of the American people, should attempt such an exercise of arbitrary power.

Mr. President, it may be considered by some that the language I use is strong; that the feeling I manifest is unreasonable; but I happen to live in that unfortunate section of the country where these things are of daily occurrence. Mr. Vallandigham, who has been referred to, was a distinguished member of the Democratic party, a politician known to the country, and when he was arrested it created great excitement throughout the land, simply because he was known throughout the land. In the quiet little village where I reside such scenes happen almost daily. I have known as many as four in a day carried off; not informed of the charge against them; dragged from their families and their homes; not allowed a hearing, and by the order of your General Schenck, or Skunk, whichever is most applicable to his character, banished beyond the lines. I have had the young wife come to my house and with tears in her eyes ask me whether anything could be done, anything could be said, to call back her young husband to take care of his infant children. I have witnessed such scenes for the last two years. They are men in the humble, quiet walks of life, and the attention of the country is not called to their cases; but when a distinguished gentleman like Mr. Vallandigham was arrested great meetings were called and great indignation expressed. It is just that those meetings should be called, and that indignation should be expressed; but, sir, the people of this country know nothing from such cases of the barbarous tyranny of this Administration. When a man of elevated position is dragged from his home they know it; but hundreds and thousands of people in the quiet walks of life are dragged from their families and their homes and the country know nothing of it. Sir, if the tears shed by the faithful and devoted wives and the worse than orphaned children in this country who have suffered from the oppression of this Administration could be bottled up as witnesses in that great and final day when a just judgment shall be rendered against men for the iniquities done in life, they would be piled mountain high upon the heads of Abraham Lincoln and his unconstitutional advisers.

Go with me to my own State, and I will take you to one single neighborhood where almost one third of the inhabitants have been dragged from their homes, not because they have done anything, not because they have ever raised an arm against this Government, not because they have ever resisted the execution of any Federal law, but because they were politically obnoxious to the party in power; and the scuff and scum of creation, men whom gentlemen would not admit into their kitchens, have the commissions of provost marshals to go into gentlemen's houses and drag them off to Baltimore before a General Schenck, who, not by any authority of the Constitution of the United States, is to sit in judgment upon those men and decide whether they shall live peaceably and quietly in their homes where they have been in the habit of living, and where their fathers have lived, or whether they shall be banished to a hostile shore.

Mr. President, I do not mean to say anything offensive to anybody; neither do I mean to say anything unbecoming my position as a member of this body; but I thank God that Clement L. Vallandigham has returned to the United States. I clipped out of a newspaper the order for his banishment, which was by telegraph. Great God! a free American citizen, living under a country the people inhabiting which are secured in their rights by a fundamental charter, a charter which secures trial by jury and freedom from arrest except by due process of law; a citizen of such a country as that arrested by telegraph, a telegraphic dispatch from the seat of the emperor at the other end of the avenue, stating, "You will send him beyond your lines, and if he returns within the lines, then you will arrest him and keep in confinement during the term of his sentence!" Now, sir, let them execute it. He has returned, thank God. The issue is made; the issue will be met. I know that two orders have been made—at least I am very well informed of that fact; I do not know it; I was not present—for his arrest; but I am informed on the same authority that they were revoked. I am also informed that a military officer has been here from Ohio for the last several days waiting hour by hour the command of the man who sits enthroned at the other end of the avenue.

Sir, I invoke not the spirit of revolution. I want peace; and hence on all occasions when questions of this character have come before the body I have always advocated a legal, peaceful remedy. I have invoked Senators from the beginning of this contest to give us the protection of law; for if this unhappy war shall continue I want to see it confined to its present location. I do not want to see civil strife in the adhering States; and hence upon all occasions have invoked the interposition of this body to preserve us from outrages that might lead to unfortunate collisions in the adhering States. I have done so even upon the subject of military interference with elections—a right secured to us by the fundamental charter of our liberties, a right dear to freemen, and a right which nobody but a tyrant despises. But even our appeal for the free exercise of the ballot has been disregarded. We have invoked you upon all occasions to give us legal security for our rights. We ask no privileges for ourselves that we do not accord to you. We say to you, "As free American citizens go to the polls, cast your votes freely for the man of your choice, even if it is for Abraham Lincoln, the man of all other men on the face of God's earth most unfit to administer the affairs of this Government, and if the popular judgment in a fair election is against us we will quietly submit and say it is the voice of the people."

But, sir, we ask the same privileges for ourselves. We of the border for the last two years have had no free exercise of the elective franchise. You have enjoyed it; boys who coincide in opinion with you have enjoyed it; people not living in our States have enjoyed it when they came into our States; convicted felons have enjoyed it; but we, simply because we are Democrats, are not allowed it. By the help of Almighty God we will be allowed to do it hereafter; and I now advertise the party in power, as an humble member of the Democratic party, we will have the freedom of election and freedom from arrest unless by due process of law, peaceably if we can; but, by the eternal gods! if we cannot get it peaceably we will have it forcibly; and you may make the most of it, if that be treason. We have submitted just as long as we intend to submit.

I say this not to offend anybody; I say it not in the spirit of bravado; but I say it in the cool, calm, deliberate determination of a man who is a member of a party of like sentiments with himself. When the convention meets at Chicago one plank in its platform will be "freedom of elections and freedom from arbitrary arrests;" to which every man, in my judgment, will pledge his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor, in the same spirit that his fathers pledged themselves in the revolutionary times in the assertion of their right of independence.

Mr. POWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to make the usual motion in regard to a recess?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. With the leave of the Senator, I move that the Senate at half past four o'clock take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I had no idea when I introduced this amendment that it would involve an investigation of the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham; neither did I suppose that it would lead to the protracted debate to which it has led; but as three or four Senators in the Opposition have given their views upon the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham and his case, I hope I may be indulged for one minute in giving my views upon that subject.

The honorable Senator from Iowa and the honorable Senator from Ohio do not seem to agree as to the issues that were before Judge Leavitt. The Senator from Iowa declared, if I understood him, that the judge held that the writ of habeas corpus having been suspended by the legal authority of the President of the United States, he would not issue the writ to have Mr. Vallandigham brought before him. The Senator from Ohio, as I understood him, said the writ of habeas corpus never having been suspended in Ohio, it had nothing to do with the case. One of the honorable Senators is mistaken. I have looked over the proceedings of the case of Mr. Vallandigham, and I regard the whole proceeding as a gross outrage and an infraction of the rights of a citizen of the United States.

I cannot agree with the honorable Senators who have eulogized Judge Leavitt so much. I have no denunciations to make of Judge Leavitt. I do not know that judge. I know nothing of his legal capacity except what I gather from the reading of his opinion in the case of Vallandigham; but taking that as the evidence, whatever may be his integrity, whatever may be his knowledge, he is certainly a very weak judge, in my opinion, for I think he is wholly wrong throughout.

I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Iowa when he asserts—and I believe the Senator from Massachusetts concurred in that opinion—that the Supreme Court of the United States, upon an appeal to that tribunal, sanctioned or affirmed the decision of Judge Leavitt. Why, sir, the case of Vallandigham was never before the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a single word?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. The case was attempted to be brought before the Supreme Court on a certain writ, and the Supreme Court made this ruling, that he was tried by a military commission; that that military commission was not a judicial tribunal; and that the court had no right to review, revise, or correct its action, and they therefore ruled it out.

Mr. POWELL. The proceeding in the Supreme Court, as I understand it, was this: Mr. Pugh applied to that court for a certiorari, to have the proceedings and the finding of the court below brought up before them; but they held that there was no such court as a military commission known to them under the Constitution, and hence they refused it. That was all there was of it. They never did sanctify, affirm, or review the opinion in any way whatever. Therefore, when the Senator from Iowa says it has been sanctified by the judgment and finding of the Supreme Court he is greatly in error.

The Senator from Ohio, however, places it upon different grounds. He says that the military authorities have a right to arrest any one whom they may regard as a public enemy, as I understand him, and to try him before a military tribunal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. POWELL. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that any man engaged in acts of actual hostility in aid of the public enemy in time of war may be arrested by the military authorities. The question as to whether the acts are sufficient must first be determined by the military tribunal by which he is to be tried, and that military tribunal is always subordinate to the President of the United States, under a writ of habeas corpus. I have not the slightest doubt about it, and in this case it was held subordinate. If Judge Leavitt had decided against this arrest, Mr. Vallandigham would no doubt have been discharged, and there would have been an end of it.

Mr. POWELL. If I understand the Senator's position now, it is this: when any person is actively engaged assisting the enemy in time of war a military tribunal has a right to arrest him, and consequently to try and punish him for that offense. In the first place, I deny that Mr. Vallandigham's case was such a one as comes within the definition given of these offenses by the honorable Senator from Ohio. Was Vallandigham actively engaged in any form in assisting the public enemy? The Senator makes some discriminations between actual support and mere words. I read most carefully the speech made by Mr. Vallandigham for which he was arrested, and for which he was tried and for which he was punished, illegally, in my judgment, and there was nothing in that speech but what a commoner of England could have spoken on every hustings in the empire, and that, too, with the utmost impunity from arrest. Mr. Vallandigham never encouraged resistance to the laws. He always advised obedience to them; and when that harsh and cruel decree was entered up, I believe that a noble, honest, liberty-loving, and Union-loving patriot was stricken down and banished from his country by the harsh edict of a usurper. I believe there never was a man since civil society was organized more ruthlessly, more wrongfully, and more unconstitutionally convicted.

The Senator from Ohio said a moment since that if an arrest by military authority is wrong you have a right to review it by the civil authorities. Has that been the practice of the Administration now in power? I aver that it has not. But Senators on the other side say that because jurisdiction attached to these military tribunals the civil authorities had no right to interfere with it. Did Judge Leavitt grant the writ of habeas corpus? I understand not. If I am rightly informed, the whole of those proceedings were upon a motion for a writ of habeas corpus, to have the body of Clement L. Vallandigham, a citizen of the State of Ohio and of the United States of America, brought before that judge for the purpose of inquiring into the fact as to whether he was lawfully or unlawfully deprived of his liberty. That was the question. The judge did not grant the writ, and consequently the proceedings were never inquired into by the judge except incidentally upon the motion.

Sir, how differently are the laws of Great Britain administered! I remember some years ago of producing to this Senate a decision of a celebrated judge in England that took place during the Irish rebellion, that rebellion that brought the illustrious and eloquent Robert Emmet to the scaffold. There was a person engaged in that rebellion taken in open arms, who bore a commission from France upon his person. He acknowledged it; he was tried by a military court; he was sentenced to be hung or to be shot, I forget which, but the sentence was death. That distinguished Irish counselor and illustrious citizen of Britain, Mr. Curran, rose in the court of king's bench and moved for a writ of habeas corpus to bring this person before the court. The sheriff came in a little while and told him that they were about to lead the man to execution. He made that fact known to the judge, and the judge instantly entered an order to serve notice, verbally, upon the military authorities not to touch that man and to bring him before that court to have the whole matter investigated; and that order of the court was obeyed.

This man, Judge Leavitt, acts very differently; but I am sure there is no principle in the Great Charter, there is no principle in the Bill of Rights, there is no principle in the Petition of Right, there is no statute of Great Britain, that secures the personal liberty of the citizen more distinctly and securely than does the Constitution of the United States. A grosser outrage never was committed upon the person of a citizen than this upon Mr. Vallandigham. It has not received the authority of any respectable court, because he was refused the writ. The court of appeals have never revised that finding at all, because they refused the process to bring the case before them.

If the military authorities have a right to try a citizen for that offense as being a public enemy, I ask the Senator if they have not a right to carry the sentence into effect by shooting or hanging him? Certainly they have. Who is to judge as to whether the citizen is a public enemy or not, unless he is engaged in the military service of those who are at war with the Government? Why, sir, the guarantees of the Constitution, which we thought threw a strong and broad shield around the liberties of the people, say that it must be done by judicial process; but nothing of that kind was done in the case of Mr. Vallandigham.

I ask the worthy Senator from Ohio if the finding of that court-martial was correct, which I utterly deny, sentencing Mr. Vallandigham to confinement at the Dry Tortugas during the war, under what law and by what authority did Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, revoke that decree and banish him from his country? Sir, the President of the United States is but a magistrate, obedient to the laws. He exercises all of his functions by virtue of authority vested in him by the law. He cannot transcend the Constitution and laws of his country any more than any other citizen. If he does, he is a criminal infractor of the law. And yet, sir, that magistrate, without authority of law, undertook to reverse and modify the finding of this military tribunal so far as to banish Mr. Vallandigham from his country. I should like to know by what authority of law he did that. He assumes to do what the Athenians did in their public assemblies by virtue of their laws, to send a man into banishment.

I have said as much as I intended to say about Mr. Vallandigham, and I regret that that matter was brought into this debate, for I have heretofore given my opinions upon the manner in which that illustrious citizen has been treated. But if he was decreed to banishment in obedience to law why do they let him come back to the country now? Has that decree ever been revoked? I suppose not.

But, sir, the object of the amendment I propose is calculated to ameliorate the condition of those who are subjects of arbitrary arrest. The object is to compel the persons who assume to make these arrests, all of which arrests are contrary to law, to hand those arrested over to the civil authorities for the purpose of being tried, and, if they are guilty, punished. That is the sole object of the amendment. My friend from Delaware is mistaken in one thing. He said he should vote for the amendment, but he regretted it somewhat because it implied that they had the right to make the arrest. If the Senator had read the whole of the amendment he would have found that he was mistaken, for there is a proviso attached to it that nothing in the section contained shall relieve the party making such arrest from being prosecuted in a civil action for it, which was put in there expressly to avoid any such conclusion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will take your word for it. I know you are always right.

Mr. POWELL. What harm can result from this amendment? I have the statute before me, of which this bill is an amendment, punishing certain subordinate officers with fine and imprisonment in the event that they do not, in obedience to the statute, release parties from confinement. My amendment merely proposes to carry that law further and punish with fine and imprisonment those who order those arrests unless they instantly hand the persons arrested over to the civil authorities to be tried and punished. There certainly can be no wrong in that. Nobody can say that you cannot arrest a rebel under my amendment. It only provides that when any person in the executive, naval, or military authority shall arrest any party, he shall instantly hand him over to the judicial tribunals to have the case investigated. I am sure there is no Senator who appreciates civil liberty but will support such a proposition as that.

I regret that men are wicked and depraved enough to require a penal code; but we know that they are so. I regret that those who are clothed with high official position so disregard the Constitution and laws of their country as to require laws to punish them for breaches of faith; but we know that men are so organized that they commit wrong; they commit crime; and hence it is but just and proper that those who are charged with the legislation of the country should make laws to punish them, and thus to secure the rights of the injured citizen. That is all that I propose. I wish to screen no man from punishment. If he be guilty, try him before the courts and punish him. My own opinion is that the higher the magistrate the greater the criminal if he violates the laws of the land. Why punish the jailer, the custodian, as you do by the law of March 3, 1863, if he refuses to deliver up the party, and allow to go free the high official who orders this wrong to be inflicted upon the citizen? If any one escapes punishment it should be the sub-official who has to obey orders. The higher the official who infracts the law the greater the criminal, because it is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate upon this matter. The amendment is one that appeals so directly to the sense of the Senate that I do not believe it will be voted down. Why do you arrest men? You certainly do it for the purpose of trying them and punishing them for their crimes. If they are guilty of crimes, hand them over to the legal tribunals and punish them speedily and promptly. That is what a humane and just Government should do. I wish to screen no man from punishment. If the Government, through its agents, lays its hand upon a citizen without warrant of law and imprisons him, deprives him of his liberty for a great length of time, and does not try him, if that person is not guilty of any offense the Government agents are themselves criminals. All that I desire is that the parties arrested shall be handed over to the courts to be tried and punished if found guilty. I ask nothing more by this amendment. We have the principle settled in the very law that I have mentioned in regard to the sub-officials. Then why not punish those who order and decree the arrests? Why punish the contemptible agent and leave the principal free? It is wrong upon every principle.

If any Senator will take up this amendment and show me where it can work any injury to the country I shall be willing to accept any amendment to meet the objection; but I think when they come to dissect it they will be unable to find anything in it save and except providing that those who are arrested for crime shall be speedily tried and punished if guilty, and then to punish the officials who arrest them unless they do hand them over to the courts for trial. That is the whole of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now take a recess pursuant to its order until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, and, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After a quarter of an hour spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

DANIEL HEBARD.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the joint resolution (S. No. 43) authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the late Captain Daniel Hebard, of the United States volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides in the settlement of the accounts of the late Captain Daniel Hebard, of the United States volunteers, an assistant adjutant general on the staff of General Gorman, the Secretary of War shall allow and pay for the whole time that officer was actually employed and on duty in the military service of the United States, whether before or after the date of his commission.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section four of the amendment of the committee:

And every such freedman shall be treated in every respect as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice; and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move also in line two of section five to insert after the word "authority" the words "under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In the fifth section, third line, after "real estate" I move to insert "belonging to disloyal persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In line thirteen of the same section I move to strike out the words "held to service" and insert "employed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. These amendments meet substantially some of the objections which have been made.

Mr. GRIMES. I move in the sixth section, in the seventh and eighth lines, to strike out the words "and that on their part they perform their duty under any contract entered into by them."

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator from Iowa thinks that will increase the security of the freedmen I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I do think so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out in the thirteenth line of the fifth section the words "and such freedmen may agree;" so as to make the clause read:

Then to cause the same to be cultivated or occupied by the freedmen, on such terms in either case and under such regulations as the Commissioner and such freedmen may agree.

Mr. SUMNER. I accept that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. In the third line of the fourth section I move to strike out "all freedmen" and insert "confiscated and abandoned lands;" so as to make it read:

That the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the general superintendence of confiscated and abandoned lands throughout the several departments, &c.

I dislike the present phraseology, "the general superintendence of all freedmen." It implies control.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make a suggestion to my friend, that I may have the benefit of his judgment upon it. It seems to me that his proposition makes the estates the principal thing and treats the freedmen somewhat as the incident or as auxiliary. Now, the very title of the bill is "to create a Bureau of Freedmen;" and it seems to me that it would be better and more consistent with the idea of the bill to keep the freedmen prominent as the main object of the bill, whereas the proposition of the Senator would bring forward the care of the abandoned and confiscated lands as the main object. I submit that to him.

Mr. GRIMES. That very idea of which the Senator speaks is what I object to, because looking on them as really freedmen I do not very much admire the idea of creating a bureau to take care of them. I would rather appoint a bureau to take care of the confiscated and abandoned estates, and let the care of the freedmen so far as they shall be cared for be an incident of the establishment of the bureau and of the care that shall be exercised over these estates. The amendment that I propose does not change the character of the section. It gives the same power to these commissioners to take charge of the freedmen that is given by the section as it stands, but it obviates some technical objections in my mind that I admit are not of very great importance, though it seems to me they ought to be regarded in framing a law of this description.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the proposition of the Senator interferes somewhat with the idea and with the harmony of the bill. I do not wish to make a question with the Senator; I regret that he moves the amendment; I should prefer to have the bill stand in this respect as it is. I do not think that his proposition improves it.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to get it into a shape in which I can vote for it.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will not press this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I withdraw the amendment, though I think it ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move in the eighth line of the second section to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert "President, with the advice and consent of the Senate." As it now reads, each department is to be under an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,000, "to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury." I propose to change it so that these assistant commissioners shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. They are much more important officers than Indian agents and have larger salaries, and I think the Senate ought to be permitted to know who they are that are to be intrusted with such important powers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. In the eighth, ninth, and tenth lines of the seventh section, I move to strike out the words "and such agents shall have the same powers in the premises as are given herein to assistant commissioners." This refers to the Treasury agents, as will be seen by looking at the section, and if I understand the phraseology in the bill as it now stands, it continues the power of the Treasury agents.

Mr. SUMNER. It continues it merely until what they are doing, and the papers and property they have in hand, can be transferred to the assistant commissioners and superintendents. It is intended merely to provide for the transition period from one system to the other; and the Senate will observe that both of them are in the Treasury Department, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the object of this section is merely for convenience' sake to enable the present agents acting under the Secretary of the Treasury to wind up their business, and to transfer the papers and lands of which they may have the custody to these newly appointed officers. I think the Senate will find that there can be no evil in the clause.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be observed that it is provided in the preceding clause of the section—

That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order 331, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act.

I do not know that there can be any valid objection to that. If these agreements or leases have been made in strict conformity with the law and the regulations of the two Departments established under the law, they ought to stand. But then the section goes on and says, "And such agents," those appointed by the Treasury heretofore, "shall have the same powers in the premises as are given herein to assistant commissioners." We have already provided by a preceding amendment which I submitted and which the Senate has adopted that these assistant commissioners shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may designate the number of districts and therefore the number of assistant commissioners. Now, suppose that he does not choose to divide Louisiana and Mississippi into departments and have the President appoint the assistant commissioners and send their names to the Senate for approval, may he not carry on the business with his Treasury agents? That is what I wish to avoid, and I want the responsibility attached to these Commissioners which we have already provided shall be attached. I do not know that these Treasury agents give bond. They certainly are not appointed by the President; they certainly are not confirmed by the Senate. It strikes me that we should have unity in this system, and we should not have a Treasury agent performing duties under this bill in one State without being appointed by the President, without holding any commission, without being confirmed by us or known to us, while in an adjacent State we have a commissioner who has been appointed by the President and confirmed by us and who has executed bonds under this law.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me call the Senator's attention to the proviso that follows the words which he has moved to strike out:

Provided, That no leases shall be made by them—for a longer period than one year, and that immediately upon the organization of any department of freedmen such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such department, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents.

The Senator will therefore see that this provision is merely transitory; it is to cover the period intervening between the old system and the new system. The proposition of the Senator, it seems to me, while it would take from these agents some of the powers they otherwise would have, would also take from them some of the opportunities of usefulness which this bill aims to secure. For instance, they could not do as much for the protection of the freedmen as they might if they were invested with these powers and authorized to act as the assistant commissioners. If, however, the Senator still perseveres in his criticism on that point, I do not wish to make a strenuous objection.

Mr. BROWN. It strikes me that the criticism of the Senator from Iowa is perfectly just. There is no necessity for giving these Treasury agents any more power. If they have authority under present laws by their appointment by the head of the Treasury Department to conduct the business in which they are now employed, they can go on under that authority and do it. There is no rhyme or reason why we should give them additional powers such as are mentioned here in this bill; and I am free to say that for my own part I shall be unwilling to confer such powers upon many of the Treasury agents who are now down there in that employ.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts himself that I am right about this matter. The clause to which he has called my attention, succeeding that which I have moved to strike out, reads: "that no lease shall be made by them" (the Treasury agents) "for a longer period than one year, and that immediately upon the organization of any department of freedmen such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such department." The agents are to cease to act when the departments are organized. When are the departments to be organized? Only at the will of the Commissioner, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. Suppose that the Commissioner does not choose to organize these departments, or if he does that the Secretary of the Treasury does not choose to confirm his action, I ask the Senator do not the Treasury agents still stand in their office exercising the powers conferred on the assistant commissioners under this bill?

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I shall not insist. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to offer a small amendment to which I suppose there will be no objection. In the seventh and eighth lines of the fourth section I move to strike out the words "in the spirit of the Constitution." They are in bad taste and quite unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt whether those words had better go out. The language is "and generally, by careful regulations, in the spirit of the Constitution, to protect these persons in the enjoyment of their rights, to promote their welfare," &c.

Mr. HOWARD. The words objected to do not affect the meaning.

Mr. SUMNER. They do not affect the legal obligation one way or the other; but the introduction of the words there does suggest that these people are to have over them the Constitution, and that whatever is done in regard to them is to be done in the spirit of the Constitution. Naturally it must be so, but still it seemed to the committee not unimportant, under the circumstances, to introduce these very words, so that everything that is done shall, according to the requirement of the text, be brought at once to the touchstone of the Constitution, and so that it shall appear that we intended that specifically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire a division? The Chair decided that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I will not make any question about it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move an amendment to come in at the end of the fifth section, to prevent a conflict between the courts and the officers under this bill:

But nothing in this section contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate and personal property before mentioned issuing in due course of law from courts of competent jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have but a single other amendment. In the third line of the first section I move after the word "office" to insert "to continue during the existing war."

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend that by adding "and two years thereafter."

Mr. POWELL. I doubt whether that is in order; there is already an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an amendment in the third degree, and not in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which is an amendment to the amendment of the select committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move this amendment in order to test the sense of the Senate in reference to the duration of this measure, to ascertain, if it be possible, whether the intention is that this measure shall accompany the war, and be considered as an incident of the war, or on the other hand a settled policy in the civil administration of our Government without reference to our present difficulties. The statement of it indicates my intention without an argument.

Mr. SUMNER. I have said often in the discussion of this question that I regarded it as a transition measure calculated to serve a temporary purpose, to bridge over, if I may so express myself, the period from slavery to freedom. That, I think, was the idea of the committee. I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania was no stranger to it, as we had the honor of numbering him on our committee. But while that certainly is my idea, I should be unwilling to insert in the bill a limitation positively closing the activity of this bureau with the war. I think it is too much to suppose that the exigency out of which it arises will have passed over with the war. I think it may continue longer. With the modification proposed by my colleague, continuing it two years after the war, I should have no hesitation in agreeing to the amendment. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will accept that modification.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There is not the slightest pretense of power in the Government of the United States to administer such a system except in connection with the war, and by virtue of the power which this Government possesses in its prosecution. My amendment is to test that most plain, most evident, most indisputable principle, about which no member of this Senate can be ignorant.

Mr. POMEROY. The intention of the committee, as the chairman will bear witness, was that this measure should be a temporary one. It is obvious to every one that we cannot carry on this system within States in the Union represented here in Congress. These freedmen are to be citizens of the States, and when States come back into the Union we cannot undertake to exercise control over them. I regard this as a temporary measure that should be dispensed with at a very early day, within a year or two years after the restoration of the Union. I am very clear that it is a system which we should not undertake to perpetuate at the South when those States are restored to the Union. I should like to have a limitation in the bill.

Mr. WILLEY. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania meets an objection which I mentioned the other day, a very fundamental objection, it seemed to me, to some extent; but I desire to call his attention to the operation of the amendment, for I think it involves a great principle. It is not without the range of possibility that this war may last several years yet. In the prosecution of it it may be that in the States of Arkansas, Tennessee, and Virginia the rebellion may be overcome before the war is thoroughly ended and the rebellion crushed elsewhere; and those States freed from the power of the rebellion may one after another be reorganized and come back to their allegiance and their true position in the Federal Union. That may be two, three, four years before the war is ended. When one or two of these States, or more, as the case may be, shall have been fully restored to the Union, their State governments fully reorganized and in operation according to the terms of the amendment as it now stands, the States thus restored must be subject to the operation of this law and this system of machinery until the war is ended everywhere.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to explain. My amendment relates to the first section of the amendment proposed by the committee, which simply organizes the bureau. My amendment is that the duration of the bureau shall be measured by the war. With reference to discrimination as between the different States which are now in rebellion, that is quite another question.

Mr. WILLEY. What I desired was to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to that question. I cordially concur in the necessity of some limitation of time, but I think provision ought to be made to meet the case of States in the condition I have named.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is a subsequent question.

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 17, noes 9.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have one or two amendments which I wish to propose, though I do not expect to support the measure. I move, in the seventh line of the first section of the amendment of the committee, to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,000." This I understand to be a bureau officer in the Treasury Department, who is provided for in this section which proposes to give him $4,000 salary for a year. I cannot see the propriety of giving that salary to this bureau officer, while the same salary is denied to other bureau officers. In the Interior Department all the heads of bureaus get $3,000, except, I believe, the Commissioner of Patents, and he is paid out of a fund which comes from the persons who are benefited by the operations of that office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has charge of an immense interest of the country, the Commissioner of Pensions, who now has charge of a very large interest, and a growing interest, affecting a very large portion of the people of the country, and in the Treasury Department the different Auditors, among whom I may mention the Second and Third Auditors, whose business now covers millions upon millions every month—these officers, having charge of the most important questions of the Government, get a salary of $3,000 per year. Here is created in this section an officer of like rank, with no greater responsibilities, to say the least, than these other officers have. I think a discrimination to the prejudice of the men who now so acceptably fill the positions of heads of bureaus should not be made. Therefore I move to make it $3,000, the ordinary salary of bureau officers.

Mr. SUMNER. My single objection to it is this: the hope of those who have taken a part in bringing this measure forward has been to secure in this office a first-class man, a person who by character, by education, and by sympathy would be the best fitted possible for the responsible duties we are about to impose on him; and on inquiry it did not seem to us that we could obtain such a man, or that we could invite such a man to enter upon these duties unless we were ready to offer him the salary specified in the bill. I hope the Senate will adhere to the original salary as proposed by the committee. It seems to me that in cutting it down, as the Senator from Indiana proposes, they will perhaps make it necessary to take a second-rate man when we wish to have, if I may say so, a first-rate one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator says we should secure a man with proper qualifications. I admit that. The second point is that he should be of right sympathies. We know what it costs to get qualifications. We know that by the salaries paid to the men now at the head of bureaus. I presume, though I am not acquainted with very many of them, that they are men qualified for the high and very responsible duties they discharge. Three thousand dollars has commanded the proper ability in the Pension Office, in the Land Office, in the Second and Third Auditors' offices. So with the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Second Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and the Assistant Secretary of War, officers that stand next to the heads of Departments. We are supposed to have given a salary sufficient to secure high talent, and these men have to act upon questions involving hundreds of millions of dollars per annum.

How much the sympathy should cost I do not know. That is a question with which the Senator from Massachusetts is much more familiar than I am. I presume, however, the fact that a man had a very earnest sympathy in behalf of the population that is to be benefited by this measure would not make him charge more, because he was going to take an office to benefit them, than if he did not have that sympathy. So I think the proposition is not right. I would be in favor, if that were the pleasure of the Senate, of raising the salaries of all the bureau officers, and all the clerks here. I think it should be done. I am not able to see how some of them live, at the present enormous cost of living, on what they get; some get only $1,200 a year. I do not understand it. But the Senate has declined upon a square vote to raise the salaries of the different Assistant Secretaries and of the heads of bureaus. While the Senate is taking that position in reference to the interests of the Treasury, I think we ought not to depart from it in one single instance and thus make an invidious discrimination.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says that we have adopted a rule not to raise salaries. We are now creating a new office, and the question is whether we shall not do that justice to this new officer which the Senator says in his opinion ought to be done to the old officers. Now, I take the Senator at his word. Here is no proposition with regard to an old officer; here is a new creation; and the committee is fixing the sum at $4,000 felt that they were doing something to give the office that solidity of foundation which, considering its importance, it ought to enjoy. I hope the salary will not be reduced.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the fifth section I move to strike out in the fourth and fifth lines the words "and all real estate with the houses thereon liable to sale or confiscation;" so that the clause will read:

The assistant commissioners shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, within their respective departments, to take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, or to any claim of title by the United States, &c.

The first part of this section provides for taking the possession and control of abandoned real estate. What is an abandoned estate is a matter of fact that can be judged of only by observation, and I presume that the commissioners would be competent to make that observation and decide the question of fact. But in the fourth and fifth lines it is provided that these commissioners shall take possession also of lands and houses liable to sale or confiscation. I suppose this contemplates a liability to sale or confiscation under the confiscation laws of the United States. What property is liable to confiscation and sale under those laws is a judicial question which can be decided only by the courts. I am not able to say what are the circumstances that must be established in proof before lands can be confiscated during the life of the owner; I should have to turn to the statutes; but there must have been an act of rebellion with an intent, and all those circumstances must be proved to the satisfaction of a court before lands can be declared confiscated. Now, I submit to the Senate that this judicial question, properly referable to the courts, ought not to be referred to an assistant commissioner to be decided by him. He cannot tell by observation whether lands are liable to confiscation, as he can tell whether lands have been abandoned. The one is a matter of observation; the other involves a question of judicial investigation which these assistant commissioners have no machinery or opportunity of determining. I think this provision ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand the clause as being of the import ascribed to it by the Senator from Indiana. I understand the real estate referred to here to be real estate which has been abandoned by the owner, which is left without anybody in possession of it in the name or on behalf of the owner, property that has been given up and that has been quit, left by the owner.

Mr. COWAN. And "all other real estate."

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose it cannot refer to any real estate except such as has been abandoned and given up by the owner. I do not understand this as authorizing the commissioner to enter into real estate and take possession of it by the strong hand and take it from the owner, though the owner may be a rebel, without due process of law. I certainly should not think it proper to give him such power as that, and I do not think, properly construed, this clause does authorize it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Michigan be right, there is no necessity for these words, because if the lands be in fact abandoned the first paragraph will cover the cases that the Senator admits ought to be provided for; but as the committee have reported this bill with these two clauses, the one case is "abandoned real estate," the other lands "liable to sale or confiscation." Now, does the Senate intend to give to these commissioners without the opportunity of investigating the question the power to turn men out of the possession of their lands, and to take possession of them simply upon the decision of a commissioner? Whether lands ought to be confiscated is a question that ought to be tried by the courts, and not in this irresponsible mode.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to understand precisely the bearing of the Senator's amendment. It seems to me that the sentence will not be accurate unless there is another word inserted. As I understand, the Senator proposes to strike out "all real estate with the houses thereon liable to sale or confiscation," so as to make it read, "to take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, or to any claim of title by the United States."

There ought to be words "or subject," so as to read, "or subject to any claim of title by the United States." Let that word come in and I have no objection then, because I think the language that remains would be broad enough to cover all practical cases.

Mr. COWAN. Say "belonging to the United States."

Mr. SUMNER. Add the word "subject" after "or."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am afraid that would be rather broad. What I want to avoid is this: I do not think the commissioners, not acting under any judgment of a court, ought to be authorized to enforce a claim of the United States and take possession from the occupant. If the claim of the United States has been established by judicial proceedings, such as would be required, I should have no objection; but this is conferring judicial as well as executive power upon the commissioner. Suppose that the land is in the possession of the former owner, and the Government asserts some claim to it, would it be the pleasure of the Senator from Massachusetts to confer upon the commissioner, upon his own investigation of the subject, the power to turn a party out of possession without a judicial proceeding and investigation? I should be afraid that the word would be too comprehensive; indeed, I think the whole of that where it rests merely on a claim ought to be left to be enforced like other claims of the Government.

Mr. SUMNER. The obvious purpose of this language was to meet a class of cases where the real estate with the houses thereon were openly and clearly liable to sale or confiscation; in the first place for the non-payment of taxes, and in the next place because the owner was a rebel. That was the object of the language, and I think if the Senator bears that in mind the language will not be obnoxious to his criticism: "all real estate with the houses thereon liable to sale or confiscation or to any claim of title by the United States."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me ask the Senator if these words would be satisfactory to him: "to take possession of all abandoned real estate."

Mr. SUMNER. "All abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons."

Mr. HENDRICKS. "And all estates to which the United States have title." Then that would give them the control of the Government property; that would obviate what I think is a very serious objection to the present language of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Still the Senator leaves out two operative words there, "sale or confiscation." I should like to have those words remain in some way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Now, I will read the amendment as I propose. I propose to strike out the words as I did before in the fourth and fifth lines, "and all real estate with the houses thereon liable to sale or confiscation or to any claim of title by the United States," and insert "estates to which the United States have title."

Mr. SUMNER. It would be better to preserve the first part of the sentence, and then say "and all other estate, with the houses thereon, to which the United States, for non-payment of taxes or confiscation, have title."

Mr. HOWE. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it seems to me he does not want to include in this clause estates liable to sale for non-payment of taxes, because it strikes me that must create a conflict of jurisdiction between the tax commissioners and the officers to be appointed under this law.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator understands the tax commissioners report at the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOWE. They report to the Treasury Department, but the law under which they act directs them in the case of non-payment of taxes to sell the property, and if they sell the property somebody purchases it, and the purchaser will be entitled to possession. This law directs the Commissioner appointed under this act to take possession and lease it. Thus the lessee of this Commissioner and the purchaser under the law for the collection of taxes would be litigant claimants to the same estate. I think we should not interfere with the operation of that law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that my amendment be reported as modified.

The Secretary read, as follows:

In lines four and five of section five strike out "and all real estate, with the houses thereon, liable to sale or confiscation, or to any claim of title of the United States," and to insert "and estates to which the United States have title, and estates of which the United States have possession."

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest to allow the first part to stand, and then say "and all estates, with the houses thereon, to which the United States have title." That substantially adopts the idea.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes; and I have added, "and estates of which the United States have possession."

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator had better leave the language of the bill, "all real estate with the houses thereon," so that there shall be no question about the houses.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to that; but I would not want to be the author of that language, because houses are part of the real estate; I would not like to use language that was not exactly professional myself. If the Senator desires to put that in, I have no objection; but let it be on his own motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Then say "all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which they have possession."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is substantially what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. But there may be some real estate where they are out of possession.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then if they have title the Commissioner will take possession.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; then it should be "or," and not "and;" "all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which they may be in possession."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well, put it in that shape; I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I move to strike out in the third line of the fifth section the words "all abandoned real estate," and leave the words that have just been put in.

Mr. SUMNER. The language here is, "all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons."

Mr. POWELL. I do not think the words "abandoned real estate" ought to remain in the bill, because it will be impossible for these commissioners to determine or adjudicate to whom an abandoned estate does belong. They cannot decide whether the owner is loyal or disloyal. There are thousands of abandoned estates in that region of country that belong to loyal men. These commissioners are not the proper tribunal to decide whether they are loyal or disloyal. They could go there under this bill and take possession of the estate of any individual if they found it abandoned. They are not the proper tribunal to try the question of loyalty. That matter must be submitted to the courts. There is no mode or means pointed out in the bill by which the commissioners are to adjudicate the question. They go there and they see a farm, for instance, that has no occupant upon it, and they seize it and call it "an abandoned estate belonging to a disloyal man." I think the question of loyalty should be settled by some judicial finding, particularly before you seize property. In the confiscation bill passed some time ago you authorized the President to have property seized and taken by an action in rem and sold for the benefit of the Government, and the money to go into the Treasury where the property belonged to disloyal persons. You will see at once the confusion that will arise from the conflict of these laws. This bill allows the commissioners when they go down there to take possession of a farm which they find without anybody upon it. They are to institute no inquiry as to whether it belongs to a loyal person or not. Really, the bill makes them a kind of grabbers, a kind of land-sharks and land-pirates, to go through the country and where they find a farm or house unoccupied to seize upon it. You authorize them by law to go and commit a trespass on the rights of every citizen that is not in actual possession of his estate. The Senator certainly has not looked to the broad power that he is conferring here. Thousands of loyal men in the southern country have gone off and left their farms unoccupied; and you, by your law, vest a commissioner with power to go and seize that property, provided, in his opinion, he thinks it belongs to a disloyal man. I hope the provision will be stricken out.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the words will not be stricken out. If they are stricken out there will be very little in the way of land for the commissioners to occupy themselves with. We have already introduced into the bill the limitation moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania confining the bill to the duration of the war. I have said again and again that it is a transition measure. It partakes, therefore, of the incidents of the time. It is not a permanent measure. If it were so, the criticism of the Senator from Kentucky would be perfectly in place; but as it is for the war, as it is temporary in character, as it is to meet the precise exigencies of the hour, the criticism of the Senator, permit me to say, is entirely out of place. Still further, in point of fact, during the last year the Secretary of the Treasury, under an order from the War Department, has been taking possession of all the abandoned plantations of disloyal persons wherever our armies have gone; and the object of this section was simply to reduce to the form of a statute that order from the War Department under which the Secretary of the Treasury for more than a year has been acting. If you take from the Secretary that power you leave little or nothing for the agents there to do. Why, sir, the vast proportion of all this land is abandoned, and has in time past belonged to disloyal persons. There must be discretion lodged somewhere. In this case it is under the supervision of a Commissioner who himself is under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. The discretion is as well guarded as it can be, and it is a discretion which it seems to me is essential to carry out the purpose of the bill.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator says it is a part of the exigencies of the time to clothe these commissioners with power to go and seize property that belongs to loyal men. I know that that has been the practice to some extent, and it is being practiced in my State now. The Senator says the Secretary of the Treasury has issued an order to have his agents take possession of abandoned estates throughout the South. If he has issued any such order it is void for want of legal authority.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a military order.

Mr. POWELL. I do not care whether it is a military or a civil order. Because a man is clothed with military authority that is no reason why he should be clothed with the power of a robber to take the property of a loyal man. A military man can be a rogue as well as a civilian, as we unfortunately know in these times. There is a law on the statute-book passed by Congress, a law the passage of which I opposed with all the power I could command, your confiscation law, which requires the President to have the lands of disloyal men taken by a proceeding in rem and disposed of for the benefit of the United States, the money to go into the Treasury; and if the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury or both of them have undertaken to make other appropriations of such property, they have not only acted in violation of the law but transgressed any powers they have under any law of the land.

The amendment that I propose should be adopted. Has the Senator put in his bill any provision that if the abandoned estate of a loyal man is taken possession of, the Government shall pay him rent for it? None. In my opinion the whole scheme is inaugurating robbery. It should not be passed. Certainly all possible safeguards should be put in it. You appoint a Commissioner under this bill with a large salary and he goes down South and seizes abandoned estates. There are hundreds and thousands of men now at the North, loyal men who have fled from their plantations in the South. Indeed, their very loyalty has driven them from them. Their property may be taken possession of under this bill without the consent of the owner. The man who does it is a trespasser. It ought not to be allowed. You should have some judicial investigation to find out whether the owner of the property is loyal or disloyal. Do not send your commissioners there with wholesale power to jump upon and take possession of everything they may find when the owner is not upon it. You might as well appoint a commissioner to go through the country and take possession of every abandoned horse or every piece of abandoned personal property the owner of which is not at hand. It would be just, as honest as this provision of this bill to send a roving commissioner down South to take possession of everything that the owner is not actually possessed of.

Mr. HARLAN. If I understand the purpose of this bill, it is not to affect the title to the land one way or the other, but to take possession of land that is unoccupied by the owner, whether loyal or disloyal, for the purpose of putting the contrabands to work to enable them to become self-sustaining.

Mr. POWELL. Let me ask my friend from Iowa what authority this Government has to take possession of his farm for the purpose of putting a contraband on it to make him self-sustaining. There is no such power.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose that the question of the Senator from Kentucky was hardly propounded in earnest. If the Government has a right to take the property of an individual, a subsequent question may arise whether the Government would not become liable to the individual for the use of the property, and that is the only question that could arise. That the Government may take my property, or the property belonging to the Senator, or anybody else, would not be called in question here seriously I apprehend, but the practical intention of the framers of this bill is to relieve the Treasury of the United States from the support of persons who fall into the hands of our armies as they go through the country. I have heard speeches, I think, of the Senator from Kentucky, denouncing these people as lazy and a burden upon the Treasury. He thinks it better to let them remain in the hands of their rebel masters than permit them to fall into the hands of the armies of the United States. For the purpose of avoiding this burden, the committee have framed this bill, directing a proper officer, contemplated in the bill, to take under their control these contrabands, and lands that have been abandoned, that are in the possession of no one, and put these colored people to work, and thus make them self-sustaining, permit them to earn their own bread by the sweat of their own face. This is necessary to preserve them from destruction as well as to preserve the Treasury from unnecessary expenditures.

The amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (No. 113) to settle and pay the accounts of John S. Phelps, of Missouri, as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress;

A joint resolution (No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building; and

A joint resolution (No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents; and the bill (S. No. 335) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives, extending the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports. It is deemed necessary that it should be acted on to-night. The sixty days provided for by the joint resolution of April 29 expire to-day, and the tariff bill is not yet in force, and will not be for a day or two yet, and therefore the resolution extends the operation of the joint resolution of April 29 until the 1st day of July, by which time the new tariff law will take effect.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the pending bill be passed over informally for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864, was read three times, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (No. 113) to settle and pay the accounts of John S. Phelps, of Missouri, as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The joint resolution (No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bill and joint resolution of the House:

A bill (No. 532) to establish certain post routes; and

A joint resolution (No. 68) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to release certain goods from the payment of duties.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 494) to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes; and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. J. S. MORRILL of Vermont, Mr. R. E. FENTON of New York, and Mr. S. S. COX of Ohio, managers at the conference on its part.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to House bill No. 494, the tariff bill, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the Chair, I suppose, in the usual mode; but I think it indispensable to have the occupant of the chair upon the committee, and therefore, perhaps, the matter had better lie over till the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS—AGAIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the fourth section I move to strike out the following words in the fifth, sixth, and seventh lines: "proclamations and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen." The first part of the section provides that "the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several departments, and it shall be his duty especially to watch over the execution of all laws." Now, if we can thus delegate a part of the President's power to this Commissioner, let it be to watch over the execution of the laws; but this section goes further, and provides that he is also to watch over the execution of "proclamations and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen." It is to provide by law that this officer shall see to the enforcement of the proclamations and military orders of emancipation; in other words, it is by Congress to recognize the validity of the proclamation of the President declaring certain persons to be free. For myself, I do not believe the President of the United States has any power to make a slave a free man, or a free man a slave. No such power is conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States. I do not choose to discuss now how far the operations of the Army, in breaking up the relations between the master and his slave, may cause the freedom of the slave; but I speak now simply of the legal effect of the proclamation of the President of the United States. This bill proposes to recognize as valid and of sufficient power to have the effect of producing the freedom of the slave the proclamations issued by the President of the United States.

I think that the President himself and the Secretary of State have both most clearly announced the proposition that no such power was possessed by him, and the Secretary of State in his foreign correspondence intimated that if the President should undertake to exercise such a power the Supreme Court of the United States would declare such effort on his part to be invalid and void. These not having any force except perhaps a moral or rather a demoralizing force, I do not propose to vote for any law that shall direct any executive officer of the Government to put them in force. If the President as the head of the Army directs the generals, as he has already done, to see that his proclamations are enforced, we have no control over that and no connection with it; but this proposition is that Congress shall recognize as constitutional and valid proclamations which I think no Senator really believes the President had the power to enforce; I mean to say that the President had not the power to make men free by his proclamation. If they were slaves, it was by virtue of State laws over which the Federal Executive has no control. I do not propose to sanction by legislation a proclamation that I believe to be invalid.

Mr. SUMNER. I am grateful to the Senator for his frankness. He states his objection so that we can all understand it. He does not believe in the proclamation of emancipation. Now, sir, I do, and I think the Senate believe it, at least a majority of the Senate.

I simply add one other remark. It is already provided that this bill is to be only for the war. Therefore, what is more natural than that the officers whom we create should watch over the military orders for the benefit of these freedmen during the war, and especially that greatest order by which their freedom has been assured?

Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Davis, Hendricks, Powell, and Riddle—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Harding, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I beg the patience of the Senate while I offer one more amendment. I move to strike out all of section seven down to and including the word "provided."

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order 331, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act: Provided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Secretary of the Treasury had authority of law to make these leases and they be valid, they do not require to be made valid by any act of Congress; but if they be not valid for want of legal authority to make them, it is for the consideration of Congress whether they ought to be approved by Congress. I will not discuss the question in the first aspect, whether the Secretary of the Treasury had legal authority to make these leases, for if he had we need not act upon the subject, but his leases stand. If the Secretary of the Treasury had not authority to make these leases my vote shall not go to affirm them. I would be very slow to vote to confirm an important act of a Department of the Government which act was not sanctioned by law, and I could not be induced to take that step at all if the act was covered up by fraud. The management of these estates in the South for the last year has been a matter of public notoriety. A system of favoritism, it is charged, has prevailed to such an extent as to disgust the country. If the reports on that subject be true, a thorough investigation has not been made. It ought to be, but it has not been made, and we must act in respect to this question upon what is generally known, publicly rumored; not very satisfactory information I am free to say, but it is enough to make us distrust ourselves when we propose to ratify that which is charged to have been done. I can scarcely express myself just as I desire. I do not want to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has had any connection with fraud; I will not say that; but that his agents have made fraudulent arrangements in respect to these lands and in respect to these leases is so generally rumored that Congress ought not to affirm them. Why the necessity of affirming them? Why not leave them where the Secretary of the Treasury under his regulations has left them? If valid, they stand; if invalid, let them fall, and let other leases be made under this law, and then they will have the force and sanction of a legal arrangement.

Mr. SUMNER. The clause which the Senator proposes to strike out was rendered necessary by the actual condition of affairs. The Secretary of the Treasury has proceeded by virtue of an order from the War Department in leasing plantations, and he has established a considerable series of rules and regulations governing such leases; but he has felt all along the necessity of the sanction of law for what he was doing in the premises. Thus far he has had no sanction of law; he has only had the military sanction under the order from the War Department; and the object of this language was simply to cover with the protection of law those leases that have been made by the Secretary during the last year. The Secretary himself asks to have that done; he thinks it ought to be done; he thinks it is essential to the business of his Department; and the committee, after the most careful inquiry into it, agreed with the Secretary. I hope the clause will not be disturbed.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe it is first in order to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I move after the word "act" in the eighth line to insert:

Provided, Such leases shall not continue beyond the period of one year from their date.

This section does, as the Senator from Indiana supposes, ratify and confirm the leases that have been made by the Treasury agents heretofore appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. So far as I am concerned, I am willing they shall stand, provided they do not extend beyond the period of one year. The Senator from Massachusetts will observe that the sixth section provides that the commissioners appointed under this act shall only lease for one year. I wish to put them all on terms of equality, and therefore I move this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa shall prevail the interest will not be so very important, and I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that it had better begin with "but" instead of "provided that."

Mr. GRIMES. I accept that modification.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The words proposed to be repealed are, "nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life." As this bill provides for the occupancy of confiscated estates, I desire to repeal this clause of the joint resolution limiting the confiscation to the natural life of the offender.

Mr. SUMNER. I must ask my friend not to introduce that on this bill. The Senator knows very well that if it is introduced on this bill, when it goes back to the House of Representatives it will interfere with its passage there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust not. The other House has passed a joint resolution on this subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it is incongruous to this bill; it does not belong to this bill. Here is a bill which is confined absolutely to one subject, a Bureau of Freedmen, and I entreat my friend not to load it down with anything else.

Mr. SHERMAN. I congratulate my friend from Massachusetts on his discovery. I had charge of a bill the other day, and it became my duty under the rules and usages of the Senate to attempt to exclude from it all legislative amendments. I had to separate myself from my political associates and vote against my own convictions on one or two propositions, simply to carry out a duty, as I supposed, to the Senate itself, to keep off of the appropriation bill incongruous amendments. There was a proposition to let Indians and negroes testify in the courts of justice, and propositions to survey the public lands, &c. I congratulate him now on knowing how such propositions affect a bill of which he has charge. He is now begging off. He is the last man to complain about an amendment of this character. As I think the amendment is a very important and proper one, I am rather disposed to vote for it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Ohio will pardon me. I think the other night he was clearly wrong, and I think now I am clearly right. I think the difference is all the world between an appropriation bill and a measure like this. An appropriation bill is made to carry weight; an appropriation bill is a through train; and the Senator who has charge of an appropriation bill must expect to take a passenger or two on the way. A measure like this is in no sense a through train.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator does not mean to suggest that this is likely to stop. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not. I think my friend from Illinois had better withdraw his proposition.

Mr. CARLILE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois if the resolution referred to in his amendment is the resolution that in express terms restricted the confiscation of real estate to the life of the owner.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. The object of the amendment is to repeal the last clause of the joint resolution which was passed after the passage of the confiscation act. The Senator from Indiana may remember that a joint resolution was passed explanatory of the confiscation act, the last clause of which was as follows:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

My amendment proposes to repeal those words, and leave the confiscation to extend to life or to be absolute as the Constitution may be decided to provide. I propose to leave it where the Constitution has left it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois how he can reconcile his position with the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I reconcile it with the Constitution in the same way that I reconcile with it the right to shoot a traitor, to destroy him, to destroy his property and everything that he has for the purpose of putting down this wicked rebellion. When we are engaged in war we have a right to do whatever is necessary to accomplish the just ends and objects and purposes for which the war is waged, and in order to put down this rebellion we may take the lives of men, their property, and everything else.

Mr. McDUGALL. Then I understand that although the Senator has often taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made under it, and although he took that oath on entering upon his present office, and although his right to his present place in the Senate is dependent upon that oath, nevertheless he thinks himself justified in trampling upon a plain provision of the Constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I say no such thing. I say it is as constitutional to take the rebel's property as his life; and does the Senator from California sit there and pretend that we may not take the life of the rebel without going to a court? What sort of a war would that be which should be prosecuted by jury trials and constables, when your armies are opposing each other, and when hundreds of thousands of men are arrayed against the Government? I am not to be put in any such position as that of advocating an unconstitutional measure. It is clearly and palpably constitutional, and as clearly and palpably right, in my opinion, as it is to exert the power of this Government in any other way to suppress this wicked rebellion.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, the provision of the Constitution to which I have called the attention of the Senate was adopted by men who were just out of the struggles of the Revolution, where for a time they occupied the position of rebels against English authority, subject to the laws of attainder and confiscation as they existed under English rule. With the lessons learned in the struggles of the Revolution, they said then for themselves and for the periods that were to come after them, that the law confiscating the property of persons in arms, guilty of treason, if you please, or rebellion, is an oppressive and unjust law. In affirming this opinion they but repeated the expressed judgment of the great teachers of moral, social, and governmental ethics. They laid down the constitutional rule of law with exact reference to questions such as the one now pending, and made it part of the fundamental law of the Republic. It is so plain that he who runs may read it. It cannot be misunderstood; it cannot be misconstrued.

The Senator says that the law of force, the law of the field of battle, shall be the law in legislative halls, shall be the law in courts of justice. For that law of the field of battle he goes back into the old Roman times, into the barbarous ages, to the practice that existed before any law on the shores of the Mediterranean and in western Europe. Such a doctrine has not been advocated by intelligent, well-advised, and just men in any period of history, and has been distinctly repudiated by all writers and thinkers since public law has engaged the attention of the civilized or semi-civilized world. I am astonished that a Senator who is, as a general rule, a strict adherent to the Constitution, and who must, from the exactness of his memory, remember the oath taken by himself, and which has to be taken by all Senators, should find in the law of the battlefield, in the midst of arms, the governing rule for legislative or judicial action. I am astonished at it, and I choose to take the occasion here now to express my astonishment.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, my colleague, whether right or wrong in his law, is not truly representing the sentiment of the people that he represents here, by stating this as his position. The people of California are in favor of the confiscation of rebel property; they are in favor of destroying rebels, and, in the terse language of the Senator from Illinois, they are in favor of destroying everything the rebels have. By their legislative resolutions they have spoken, and I believe they have instructed my colleague to support and sustain this very identical proposition. There is no voice in the Union more determined, more clear, or more emphatic than the voice of California for destroying rebels and their property, for carrying on this war, not as the Romans did, not according to my colleague's system of ethics, but according to the declarations of my colleague before he was made Senator by the people of California. I had the pleasure in the Legislature of California to cast a vote for my colleague's election to this body; but I am very free to say that it would not have been cast upon such a declaration of opinions as he has made here-to-night. Those opinions did not prevail then in that State and with the loyal men of that State. There was an intensity connected with their loyalty that was given it by patriotism, and I understood my colleague to join in that sentiment and to give expression to it.

Sir, I would not come into this debate with these few remarks but that I wished that that State and its opinions upon this particular subject should be represented here. It may be that my colleague does not believe in the right of instruction. Perhaps we shall hear from him upon that. I hope that this amendment will be adopted; and I will close by reminding the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that by the very system now proposed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio some of the honorable Senator's greatest triumphs have been achieved in this body. I am very glad that the amendment has been moved, that there shall be no question as to the opinion of the country and the right of the country to take possession of as much of the land as is occupied by its enemies.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I believe that it has not heretofore happened that I have been forced into collision with my colleague. He has on several occasions offered the opportunity, but I have been indisposed to accept his gage for prudential reasons, first regarding the interest of my constituency and then again disliking his Puritan system of warfare. I regret that the occasion has now been forced upon me; and as it has come I do not feel that it is occasion for the splintering of lances. If I have occasion to handle one it will be one with an unpointed head.

The Senator, my colleague, has informed the Senate that I do not represent the opinion of the people of California on this subject. Sir, that is a question which will have to be tested hereafter. It has not been demonstrated as yet. I think that when the question comes to be tried in the State from which we come, and the voice and judgment of the people shall be expressed and pronounced, the Senator, my colleague, will find himself unsupported by the judgment. Such is my opinion.

The Senator has taken occasion to say that my opinions as expressed in California before I had the favor of his vote in the Legislature of that State were different from those which I have expressed here in my place. I will not say that this statement is false; to state this would do wrong to the dignity of this body; but I will say that I have never said in my place here anything inconsistent with what I avowed as my opinions in the State of California, on public occasions or in private conversation, in either spoken or written words. The individual who undertakes to maintain the contrary will undertake to maintain a falsehood.

Sir, I have heard such things, and many other such and worse things, said through those animal vehicles whose office it is to convey the poison of detraction and who secure their subsistence by the distribution of venom, the poisonous venom furnished by those who crawl where they dare not climb.

I have not the presumption to name the great Senator from Massachusetts in connection with myself, but I remember that on one occasion he gave expression to his indignation aroused by some of the class of men of whom I speak. In writing to citizens on the Kennebec river, he says:

"I know no passion more appropriate to devils than the passion for gross misrepresentation and libel." * * * "In classical times there were a set of small but rapacious critics, denominated capitales verborum, who snatched and caught at particular expressions, expen ded their strength on the dispecta membra of language; birds of rapine who preyed on words and syllables, and gorged themselves with feeding on the garbage of phrases, chopped, dislocated, and torn asunder by themselves, as flesh and limbs are by the claws of unclean birds."

Sir, there are worse than these, more like the harpies of ancient fable, who with the fair faces of women but with the maws of vultures robbed and defiled the feasts set for the gods.

I have been made subject to many assaults springing from such sources. I do not think, however, the venom inflicted by such assaults will prove mortal. So far as the just-made statements of the Senator, my colleague, are concerned, I defy him or any other person to place his finger upon a word ever used by me inconsistent with my whole conduct and with the sentiments I have always expressed. Sir, it happened to be my fortune, I am proud of it, that the first man on the shores of the Pacific who raised the standard of the Union and made battle for it called himself by my name. The Senator, my colleague, was present and witnessed it. The speech is in print. It was made in the hall of the House of Representatives in California. Every word of it was the truth in my judgment then, and I indorse it now. Then, at a time of peril, when and where the free expression of opinion was perilous, I invited open and full discussion, particularly on the part of those aspiring to the senatorial office. The hall of the House was assigned for the purpose. Of the list of aspirants I found myself the only one willing and ready to maintain the cause of the Union. I did all that was within my power to maintain the cause of my country, as a duty I owed to myself, my family, my country, and to Him who is the ruler of men and nations.

The Senator, my colleague, heard every word I expressed. Let him refer to that speech, let him quote it sentence by sentence, term by term, word by word, and he will find that I have lived up to every word of it, ay, and more. It does not become the Senator, my colleague, to say that I have failed in my loyalty, or to affirm that I maintain opinions here which I did not there. If he will satisfy Senators, or show to the satisfaction of anybody, the simplest person, that I have been in my course inconsistent, I will thank him, for I should like to correct such an inconsistency.

I did not come here, Mr. President, as a member of the Republican party. I never sought to establish such party relations. I never was anywhere or at any time suspected of any such intention. I was then, am now, and through my life have been a Democrat, and as I have lived so I expect to die. I came here as a true lover of my country, the whole country, the undivided Republic. After bestowing upon the subject careful study, I was compelled to conclude that even a friendly stipulation for separation would be nothing other than a contract for continuous war. I was unwilling to leave this continuous war as a legacy for my children. I came here to strengthen the hands of the Government, to lend it such aid as I could render toward the proper subjection of the citizens of the United States in rebellion against its Government. My own conscience approves me for what I have done. I shall do what I may do to achieve reunion, a consolidated Union, the Union of our fathers.

I do not know why the Senator, my colleague, should have taken occasion here to make this wild assault. If he desired to assault me for the inconsistency of my past position in California and my present position here, I think it would have been at least graceful for him to produce the testimony of the fact, and allow me to see why he affirms that which I undertake to say is without foundation in truth. I put this to his conscience, assuming that he in common with others of the human family possesses such a quality. The Senate will bear me witness that I have not spoken of the Senator from California, my colleague, in any unkind way. I may have had and think I have had occasion, but I do not think it becomes persons representing the same constituency to do any such thing. We have the interests of our coast to take care of, and I shall always be pleased to act with him in the promotion of the great interests of the Pacific. I do not desire, I have desired to avoid, controversy with him even when I have differed from him in opinion.

The Senator, my colleague, has made the remark that I have been instructed upon this subject, and suggested that I cannot possibly believe in the right of a State Legislature to instruct the Senators representing the State.

In the first place, the Legislature of the State of California have not undertaken to instruct me as to this subject-matter; in the second place, no Legislature can instruct me into the violation of the oath I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States. Independent of these considerations, however, permit me to say that I have but small respect for those who, occupying high place, selected for reason of their presumed capacity, are mere followers of opinion; I mean followers of uninformed opinion. A man fit to be a Senator is fit to be a leader of opinion, and the duty of leadership is as much imposed upon him in his place and sphere as upon him who leads the division of an army in battle. Of this, enough. I shall do what I think the voice of duty prompts.

Now, allow me to say, Mr. President, that I hope, I sincerely hope, this will be the last time that I shall have occasion to rise with the animus that has governed my present remarks. I have served in both Houses of Congress—this is my sixth session. This is the first time I have had a controversy forced on me by a colleague. It has been thought that duty, the great interests represented by us, forbid such controversies. During the two years I had the honor to serve the State of California on the floor of the House of Representatives, the record will show that I never on any occasion made what may be called a political or partisan speech; and why? I thought the interests of the Pacific coast demanded all my attention, and I could not engage in party politics. During the time I have occupied a place on this floor, I think I may justly say that I have never engaged in any form in what may be called partisan politics. I desire to avoid them. I think that we of the Pacific have great interests of our own, and I trust that the time will again come when the California delegation, as a unit, without wasting vain words of controversy, will direct their attention to the development and progress of those great interests that gather and cluster about our possessions on the Pacific and centralize in the noble bay of San Francisco.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I should have not one word to say in reply to the Senator, but that what he has said will go into print, and I will now confine myself to a very few words indeed. The instructions of which the Senator has spoken so lightly were nearly unanimously passed by both branches of the California Legislature. They were the most deliberate expression of opinion ever passed by that body. The Senator has tortured what I have said into a personal attack. I beg the Senator not to so consider it. The report of the remarks that I made will relieve it of that impression entirely, and I trust relieve the Senator. I spoke but for the cause. The Senator, my colleague, had spoken upon a subject vital, as I believe, or considered vital by the people of California, and I felt it my duty to speak for that reason.

The Senator might have contented himself without having described the speech that he made on occasion when he was a candidate for United States Senator, the office that he now fills.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. McDUGALL. Speaking of that, I should like, as the Senator has alleged in the presence of the Senate that I said there other than what is consistent with my conduct here, to have him refer to it on this or some other occasion, so that Senators may know.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not undertake to put my colleague on trial here; but I will repeat now to him and for his benefit, and that the State of California may hear it, that he could not with the expression of opinions made by him here this evening on the proposition now before the Senate have received my vote nor the vote of the people of the State of California for Senator. The Senator is scarcely aware perhaps of the opinion of the people of that State at the present time. I think my colleague has not made a visit to the State since he got his election, which is now in the fourth year. The speech that my colleague refers to that he made before the Legislature of the State of California, when he was a candidate for the office of United States Senator, abounded with determination to resist the aggression made and making by the South upon us; and in that speech—I have it, I believe, in my possession, not at present in the Senate—there was contained, only diffused, everything contained in the proposition before the Senate to-night. It was a very able speech; my colleague always makes very able speeches. It was on the side of his country. It was for coercion. It was for resistance of the aggression made against us; and no other position than that would have secured him the vote of that Legislature. My colleague need not have boasted that he was the only man who came forward to speak a word for the Union. There were other candidates besides him for the office of Senator, but they were generally men deeply tinctured with secession and treason, and hence my colleague's election. Bold words, words that made opinion in the State, were spoken before my colleague ever spoke them upon this subject. My colleague I do not wish to underrate, but he has not been the foremost man in positions of danger with us, and he should not claim it here, in my opinion. I leave the people of California to judge upon that between him and myself, not setting myself up, however, against my colleague in this respect.

My colleague labors under a delusion, a delusion that somebody—myself, I believe, if I understood my colleague aright—has engaged in his detraction. God forbid, sir, that I should detract from my colleague. I have never engaged in the filthy business of detraction, much less against my colleague. I am very much obliged to my colleague for his generous offer to assist me or permit me to assist him here in developing the great interests of the Pacific coast. I am sure that with the friends of both of us our State can scarcely fail to be well taken care of and well represented.

I have not sought any quarrel with my colleague. I have not made any quarrel with my colleague. I have but sat here from day to day attending to plain matters of fact and business. If an occasion should arise when my colleague should place himself in a position that would deserve a quarrel I am not certain that I would retreat from it very far, but such an occasion has not arisen, and I trust never will arise while my colleague and myself are here. There is no member of the Senate and no person in the country who has a kinder personal feeling to himself than I have, and whether I get credit from my colleague for possessing that feeling toward him or not is a matter of very slight consequence indeed. But, sir, I will not sit here silently and quietly while war is made upon us when I know that the opinions that my colleague utters are not those that are acceptable to the loyal heart of California. My colleague refers to a trial of these opinions before the people of California. I should like to add my persuasive influence and request to my colleague to return to that State and make the trial there. That is the place for it. I will agree with my colleague that if the trial be against me in the succeeding election if he will go there with me I will resign my seat without instructions. Will my colleague say as much? I will bear him company; I will see that he is well treated and taken care of; I will aid in ushering him upon his constituents and in developing their opinions of him and myself, and in giving the people an opportunity to pass upon them. I hope my colleague will be induced to this fair mode of settlement, and I can see no loss that would result from it except in case my colleague should agree to the arrangement, and the people of California deciding against him, I should then be deprived of his great influence here in developing the interests of the Pacific coast. If it were decided otherwise, the State would suffer nothing, because I could be spared from the Senate Chamber without any injury to her interests.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, my brain has been agitated in endeavoring to determine from what particular source the Senator, my colleague, derived his humor, or whether or not wit was not the most marked quality he has exhibited; and then, again, what was the true distinction between sarcastic and sardonic. I thought of Swift, Sterne, Butler, and the Hudibrastic. Upon all these questions that have agitated me so much I am still in the fog of doubt; perhaps it is well that I should be so. There is one peculiar and noticeable feature about the Senator which may furnish the key-note to his remarkable qualities. Somewhere about the apex of the cranium or the superior posterior portion of his head appears a prolongation backward and upward; this I have no doubt forces him to think, and induces him to try to compel others to think, that he stands in the shoes of all the wisdom of ancient times and modern ages, with their wit to boot.

These peculiar manifestations, while they may not have made him the cynosure of all eyes, have, to at least a limited extent, made him the observed of all observers. His peculiarities will grow upon acquaintance. He will be found to have wit enough for a town meeting, jests enough for a ward meeting, and cant enough for any camp meeting. I have said too much about so unworthy a subject. The little quillets projected from across the Chamber have hardly reached so far as the place I occupy; they certainly have not reached to hurt. I must observe, however, a pleasant part of the remarks of the Senator, my colleague. If I did not misunderstand him, he informed the Senate that he has been or is my very good friend, and has used terms in speaking of me that a very ignorant person might construe into the language of compliment. This does not tempt me to say, beware of the beauty of the serpent, there is venom in its fangs; the comparison is not apposite; but I could not help but think of that Ithuriel who with the point of his spear revealed the serpent in the garden. It would take no Ithuriel to reveal the true spirit of the kind remarks of the Senator, my colleague. I think I could do it easily without even a javelin in my hand.

I beg the pardon of the Senate for engaging their time in saying profane things; but I trust something may be permitted to just indignation.

Mr. CARLILE. I confess, Mr. President, that I was not prepared for the proposition submitted by the Senator from Illinois, because, if my recollection is not at fault, that Senator, in the discussion of this subject when it was before this body at the last Congress, maintained the ground that real estate could not be confiscated beyond the life of the owner. That is my recollection of the discussion of this subject when it was before the Senate. The Senator will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Virginia is wrong so far as the confiscation of property in the rebel districts of country where there are no courts is concerned. I always maintained that the clause in the Constitution limiting the effect of a conviction for treason had nothing in the world to do with the waging of war in a district of country governed by the military power, and where there were no civil tribunals. I agree now that if in any of the loyal States an individual were arrested and tried for treason, convicted, and hung, that would be a sufficient punishment; and his real estate, if he had any, might go to his descendants. But I always insisted that the provision of the Constitution applied only to trials in courts of law, and had nothing to do with the prosecution of war where there were no courts of law, and nothing to do with the estates of persons who were not brought to trial in courts of law and could not be. I always insisted that a traitor who escaped from the country, like Slidell or Mason, and left real estate behind, could not therefore escape the punishment of the confiscation of his property because he was beyond our reach to be tried for treason.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, I should like to know from the Senator where he gets his authority to confiscate the property of traitors or anybody else, unless he derives it from the Constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do get it from the Constitution.

Mr. CARLILE. The proposition is now by law, not by armies, not by virtue of the military power of this Government, but under the forms of law to deprive not the traitor, not the rebel, of his property, because the Constitution gives you the power to do that, but it is to take from the innocent child that he may have left, or from the injured wife of his bosom, the means of support which the framers of the Constitution designed should be left to them. They were too familiar with proceedings of this sort; they themselves had just before the formation of that instrument been rebels; success made them patriots. It is only from the Constitution that the Senate derives any power on this subject. The Senate can in conjunction with the other House declare war, and they can make rules and regulations for the Government of the land and naval forces; but they have no power through the forms of law and by virtue of their legislative character to transcend the limits of the Constitution which expressly forbids the confiscation of the estate of any one guilty of treason beyond the traitor's life. There is no exception in favor of the suspension of that provision of the Constitution in time of war. No department of this Government is ever relieved from its obligations to maintain the Constitution, which it solemnly swears to do before it enters on the discharge of its duties. The Executive is as much governed by the Constitution in time of war as he is in time of peace. So is the Congress of the United States. The oath that members of Congress take to support the Constitution has in it no exception that it shall not be obligatory in time of war; but, wisely looking forward to what those men knew must occur in the history of the Government that they were forming, they declared in the instrument itself the powers that this Government should exercise in war as well as in peace.

The Senator speaks of his right under the Constitution to shoot down a rebel. Sir, I deny him such right. He cannot go out in the street to-day and shoot down a rebel without being guilty of murder. Not in his capacity of Senator is he justified in shooting down even a rebel. Were he in the armies of the country, then it would become his duty to do so.

Mr. President, I have forbore from troubling the Senate with any remarks upon many propositions which have been acted upon by it during this session as well as the last, contenting myself with a silent vote. I know that nothing I can say here will change the purpose of the majority of this body, and I do not care to throw myself upon them as an unwilling opposer merely for the purpose of consuming time. If I believed that anything that I could say could arouse the people of this country and fix their eyes steadfastly upon the action not alone of this body but also of the Executive, their servant under the Constitution as well as we are their servants, I might possibly have said more than I have; but I have an abiding faith in the intelligence of the people of this country, in their sense of justice, in their patriotism, ay, sir, if I may use a word that is so often used in this body for other purposes, and I think very much misapplied, in the civilization of this people; and if I am right in that opinion, there is not in any State in this Union a public sentiment that will sustain you in the act that you propose to do by the adoption of this amendment.

This amendment proposes to repeal a part of a resolution which Congress adopted in order to obtain the signature of the President to the confiscation bill. It was made known to Congress, if I am not mistaken in the history of that resolution, and if I am the Senator will correct me—it was made known to Congress that that bill could not receive the approval of the President, and could only become a law by the passage of this very joint resolution, a portion of which is now proposed to be repealed, and that portion, too, which the President required should be adopted before he would approve it.

Now, sir, what is the position in which you will place your Executive? Well may the Senator from Massachusetts, who feels a deep interest in the passage of this scheme, ask the Senator from Illinois not to load his bill with this proposition. Unless the President has reread his constitutional duties, unless he understands now differently his constitutional oath from what he did when he affixed his signature to that resolution, he never can sign this bill with this proposition in it. There might have been some excuse for such a proposition at that time. Then it was urged on Congress as an auxiliary in the suppression of the rebellion. Now it cannot be urged for any such purpose.

I do not intend to prolong this discussion; I regret that I have felt it my duty to say what I have said; but my object was to call the attention of Senators to it, for I cannot believe, until I see it by a vote, that the Senate has changed its position within the last two years, and that gentlemen read their constitutional powers now differently than they did two years ago.

Mr. COWAN addressed the Senate. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, no one shall exceed me in devotion to the Constitution, and I think I am as little disposed as the Senator from Virginia or the Senator from Pennsylvania to disregard the obligations of the oath I have taken to support it. It is an easy thing for Senators, in the confidence of the correctness of their own opinions, to give a particular construction to the Constitution and denounce as violators of their oaths and as disregards of the Constitution all who do not agree with them. It is as clear to my mind that the provision in the Constitution in regard to the forfeiture of property not extending beyond the life of the traitor has no application to the confiscation bill which we have passed as it is that the provision of the Constitution which guarantees to every person who is charged with crime an impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage has nothing to do with the protection of persons engaged in war against the United States. The power to make war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain navies, is as clearly given in the Constitution as the power to summon a jury to try a criminal in ordinary times. Both these powers exist; they are both constitutional; and the question is, when may this war power be exercised? For nobody would contend that you must impel a jury to try a rebel in arms against you before you could slay him.

As to when and where these powers are to be exercised without interfering with each other, are questions about which Senators differ. I have argued this question at some length heretofore with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I am sorry that he to-night manifests so much feeling on this subject. It seems there is a sore place that has been left from the discussions we have heretofore had as to the right to confiscate enemies' property, which has broken out again to-night.

Mr. COWAN. I beg leave to disclaim anything of that kind. I hope the gentleman will not charge that upon me. I am not in the habit of entertaining any such feelings.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very glad if the wounds that he seems to have felt are all healed, and I hope they may never break out again.

But, sir, while I shall not go into a discussion with him over again upon these questions, which were elaborately discussed here two years ago, I will so far trespass upon the time of the Senate as to read a sentence or two from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States when it was presided over by Chief Justice Marshall, which I think refutes absolutely and completely the position which the Senator has taken that there is an international law prevailing in times of war higher and above the sovereign power of the State. As I said to the Senator when I interrupted him, I have never contended that we should carry on this war contrary to international law. I hold that the right to confiscate enemies' property is part and parcel of the international law. But, sir, if it were not, it would be perfectly competent for the Congress of the United States, the sovereign power, to confiscate enemies' property; and no court ever decided in this country that a law of the sovereign power was unconstitutional because it violated what that court might suppose to be the international law. International law, the usage of nations, higher and above the Constitution and the sovereign power of a State! Why, sir, the idea is preposterous. Let us see what Chief Justice Marshall says on that very subject.

Mr. COWAN. Will the honorable Senator be good enough to read the circumstances of that case, the facts?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The case extends through one hundred pages of the volume that I hold in my hand, and I am not to be drawn off from the point.

Mr. COWAN. Read the facts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will read the decision of the court. It was in reference to confiscation. The point of the case was this: the Executive had undertaken to confiscate property without authority of the sovereign or war-making power, without authority of an act of Congress, and the court decided that that could not be done; it needed legislative action; and here is what the court say:

"There being no other act of Congress which bears upon the subject, it is considered as proved that the Legislature has not confiscated enemy property which was within the United States at the declaration of war, and that this sentence of condemnation cannot be sustained.

"One view, however, has been taken of this subject which deserves to be further considered."

And this is the very view that the Senator takes here to-night.

"It is urged that, in executing the laws of war, the Executive may seize and the courts condemn all property which, according to the modern law of nations, is subject to confiscation, although it might require an act of the Legislature to justify the condemnation of that property which, according to modern usage, ought not to be confiscated.

"This argument must assume for its basis the position that modern usage constitutes a rule which acts directly upon the thing itself by its own force and not through sovereign power."

That is exactly what the Senator contended for.

"This position is not allowed."

That is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"This usage?"

What usage? This law of nations, which is but a usage of nations—

"This usage is a guide which the sovereign follows or abandons at his will. The rule, like other precepts of morality, of humanity, and even of wisdom, is addressed to the judgment of the sovereign; and although it cannot be disregarded by him without obloquy, yet it may be disregarded."

That is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall; and yet the Senator rises here and disputes it all.

As I have said, I am not disposed to go into this argument and take up the time of the Senate in discussing a question which occupied weeks of its time some two years ago. But the Senator says it is a monstrous proposition to think of stripping the whole people of the South, and that the suggestion of such an idea has driven them together. Sir, who ever suggested it? Nobody that I ever heard except the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have heard in this Chamber or elsewhere nobody suggest the idea of stripping the whole people of the South of all their property; but what did we suggest? We suggested stripping the rebels and the traitors of their property. Did that make traitors of loyal men? Did that make them all unite together? That is a beautiful species of loyalty which runs into treason the moment we take the property of the traitor.

Mr. COWAN. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting him. I shall not interrupt him oftener than he interrupted me. I should like to know whether he does not hold that all the people of the South who have been engaged in this rebellion, who have borne arms, who have obeyed, in other words, the de facto government, are rebels?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; if they have been coerced into it they are not rebels. It is only those who have willingly committed treason that I would punish, or ever proposed to punish, or that the confiscation act ever proposed to punish. The Senator from Pennsylvania takes this most extraordinary view of the subject: he says that when there was a large portion of the South loyal and true to the Union, and we undertook to aid and sustain them, we must do it by helping the rebels. These Union people down there, these loyal people that he talks about, were offended with us because we proposed to punish the traitors that were oppressing them. Is not that reasonable? Is not that human nature? That is his argument. He states it differently, because he talks about stripping all the people of the South of their property, a proposition that no mortal man ever advocated or advanced.

Our confiscation act that we passed two years ago did not amount to much; it has never been enforced. The Senator has had his own way.

Mr. COWAN. You did not get the bear, and of course you could not confiscate the hide.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We never have confiscated it where we had the power.

Mr. COWAN. Oh, yes; all around here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To but a very limited extent. We have never taken the property of rebels except during their lives.

We have a bill now pending before us which the Senator from Massachusetts has brought forward, providing that where these traitors in the South have abandoned their property and gone off to fight us in the rebel army, to slay your son and mine, our relatives and friends, and overturn our Government, the freedmen of the South, the slaves, may take possession of this abandoned property, and it may be leased to them for one year. The Senator from Pennsylvania contends that when the rebel master who owned that plantation is in the army fighting us, if some of our brave boys should happen to slay him before Petersburg, the moment that we killed him the freedmen whom the Senator from Massachusetts placed on the plantation must leave it; and why? Because you can only forfeit the property of that traitor for life, and inasmuch as one of our brave boys slew him in battle you must take your freedmen off from his plantation and give it up to some traitor relative that will furnish the avails of it to fight you still longer. I believe in no such policy. I would offer no reward to preserve the life of a traitor. Why, sir, the freedmen placed upon these plantations would all be interested in preserving the life of the rebel owner if they had to give up the plantation when the crop was made in case the rebel owner was slain.

This amendment, therefore, is directly pertinent to this bill. In my judgment, had we passed an efficient confiscation law two years ago instead of one which was of very little value had it been executed and of no value when unexecuted, we should have made far greater progress in this war than we have. I would have divided out these plantations among loyal men long ago. I would not have allowed rebel generals who have been fighting us for the last three years to hold estates in the North from which they derive large incomes with which to furnish munitions of war to contend against us. I never believed in such a policy. We tried it under the auspices of the Senator from Pennsylvania and persons like him for two years. We attempted to fight these rebels so as not to hurt them. Our brave boys went down to the South, and when we drove the rebel armies before us, they were stationed around rebel plantations to guard and protect them; and, sir, when in the vicissitudes of the war they were driven back from the positions they had occupied, the very females whom they had protected shot at them from the houses they had guarded. In my judgment, war means desolation; it means death; it means destruction; and if I could have my way, these rebels should have all three, death, desolation, destruction, and I had almost said damnation. Sir, we can make nothing by undertaking to win them back. I would not touch the hair of the head of a loyal man. I would encourage him; I would reward him for his loyalty and protect him in it; and no true loyal man will ever turn traitor because you refuse to protect and uphold the traitor who oppresses him.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this amendment will be withdrawn, and I hope so for the reason that I think it fatal to the bill we now have under consideration. I do not think we have a great deal more time to devote to this bill. We are talking of adjourning this week. If we give up that idea and devote ourselves to them we can give time enough to this bill and some others and pass them. This is a measure of humanity, a temporary measure to last during the war, to aid the freedmen, and I trust that we shall not take up more time by undertaking to force upon it the amendment now pending. Let us pass this bill, and then take up what I consider one of the great bills of the session, the bill to give the confiscated lands to our soldiers, and then upon that bill put a proposition of this kind if Senators desire to do it. There is a great measure that has passed the House of Representatives, a measure that secures to the men who are fighting the battles of the Republic the confiscated rebel lands and the lands sold or to be sold for the non-payment of taxes; and such an amendment as the one now pending belongs to a measure of that kind, and not to the bill now before us. This bill has already occupied the attention of the Senate for four days before to-day, and unless we act upon it to-night I doubt very much if we can pass it. I hope therefore that this amendment will be dropped.

But, sir, I desire to say a single word to the Senator from Pennsylvania before I sit down. I was sorry to hear him say here to-night what is said so often without the semblance of being sustained by the facts before the country, that the emancipation policy of this Government had united the South and divided the North. There is not the shade of a shadow of truth about it. The South is more divided to-day than it was three years ago, and everybody knows it. How was it in Delaware three years ago to-day? It was doubtful if the loyal men had the State at all. How was it in Maryland? She was held by twenty or thirty thousand men, held only by the military power of this nation, and all her leading influences were in favor of the rebellion; and to-day Maryland is for the country and for the Government, a free State of this Union. How was it with West Virginia? West Virginia was then divided and struggling in civil war; now she is a free State, and for the country. How was it in Kentucky? Kentucky three years ago was under the control of men who were talking about armed neutrality, and rolling back the armies of the Union and the armies of the rebellion, and dictating a peace when both parties were exhausted by war. Kentucky is more united to-day than she was three years ago for the country. How is it in Missouri? She is almost as united for the Government to-day as any free State in the Union, and three years ago she was overrun and held by rebel influences. How is it in Tennessee? How is it in Arkansas? How is it in Louisiana? How is it even in North Carolina? There is not a slave State in this Union to-day that is not more divided and where we have not more real supporters of the Government of the United States than we had two or three years ago. That is God's truth, and every man knows it; and yet men get up here and tell us that our policy is uniting the South and dividing the North! Why, sir, the loyal men of the South are stronger for the Government to-day than ever before, and they are for emancipation. I do not know a man for slavery in this country who is really for this Government. I have yet to see one.

How is it with the North? I know that when the firing took place upon Sumter, when the people rose in their majesty, there were men in the country who bowed to the storm, bowed to the current; but, sir, at the first opportunity, and even before your confiscation bill or your emancipation proclamation, they were everywhere in their party lines, under their party flags; and when the emancipation proclamation was issued to the country these very men had taken almost all the States of the North under their control. That emancipation proclamation had hardly gone to the country before the people began to comprehend it and to understand it. They rose in their majesty, and they hold to-day the control of almost every free State of this Union. They are stronger to-day for this policy in every State of the Union; and I say here now there is not a loyal State in this Union where naked, raw abolitionism is not stronger than any political party in that State. The Republican party or the Union party in no portion of the country is so strong to-day as is the anti-slavery party; and the men who march square up to that policy are the men who will guide, direct, and control, and be supported by the people.

I tell Senators that such speeches as we have listened to on this floor to-day, accompanied by threats and predictions of what is to take place, will strengthen Abraham Lincoln more than any speeches that could have been made by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. I thank the Senators for making them. I tell them further that in my judgment this political question is settled. When slavery has plunged this nation into the fire and blood of civil war, and filled tens and tens of thousands of graves, and a great party of this country straps slavery to its back, as the Democratic party has done by its vote in the House of Representatives on the constitutional amendment, and undertakes to stagger under the load in the blazing light of this day, when the flashes from the battle-fields are upon it, they will find they are carrying a load that no human power can carry to victory. That vote settled the result of the presidential election.

But, sir, I do not wish to enter into that subject. I am tired of this talk about the policy of emancipation being a policy that has weakened this country. It has strengthened us on every square rood of God's green earth. There is not a country in Christendom where our cause is not stronger for it; in England, France, Europe, everywhere all over the globe as well as at home. We are stronger with the people; we have befriending us the mighty moral influences of the universe, and, we believe, the blessing of Almighty God, because we have put ourselves right, and we are certain to triumph. I entertain no doubt about it.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. COWAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a word.

Mr. HALE. Yes, I have no doubt about it. [Laughter.] I got the floor about two hours ago to say a word or two, but the whole talk with my friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON]—I do not know whether my friend from Pennsylvania joined with them—was, "Let us have a vote, let us have a vote." In obedience to that universal expression of opinion I sat down, expecting a vote; but I found that the fair rendering of the question was, "Oh, Hale, you sit down; let me talk." [Laughter.] And thereupon I believe about everybody who asked me to sit down has made a long speech; and the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. WILSON. I did not ask you.

Mr. HALE. Yes, you did.

Mr. COWAN. Nor I.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts evinced the sincerity of his purpose by getting up to take a vote, whereupon he made a long speech.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. I shall not give way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask whether the Senator will not make his speech to-morrow. We will listen to him with pleasure then.

Mr. HALE. I would rather make it to-night, and I will tell you why. I have taken a comfortable nap while these gentlemen were talking, and

I am now ready to talk. [Laughter.] I do not want to say a great deal; but I have heard more nonsense upon this simple clause of the Constitution which I propose to read than I thought it was in the power of human ingenuity to gather together upon any one subject; and that clause is this:

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

My friend from Pennsylvania is a man, whatever may be said of his politics, of remarkably clear intellect; and where he has not suffered his intellect to be led away by the absurdities of black-letter English law, I have no doubt is a good lawyer; but, sir, there is a natural delusion upon this subject. We are in more absolute dependence to-day upon Great Britain than we were before the Revolution of 1776. We have got all the offensive and odious provisions of her constitution fastened upon us. This idea of the independence of the judiciary, and that there must be a life-tenure to our judicial officers, is an inheritance from England that we cannot get rid of; and the same is true—it is not declared in express terms, but is practically so—making a life-tenure in our officers in the Army and the Navy. That is another of those sad inheritances that come down to us from the original sin of our ancestors being born under the monarch of Great Britain. Notwithstanding our fathers gave utterance to some of the sublimest truths that ever fell from human lips in the Declaration of Independence, we have not begun to act upon the first principles, the first elements of the doctrines which they enunciated.

My friend from Pennsylvania has confounded two things that are as different as it is possible for two things to be. The one is, what the sovereign power of the United States may do, and the other is what it has delegated to its courts to declare. The Constitution of the United States, in the clause I have read, does not undertake to limit nor measure nor control in the slightest degree what the sovereign power of the nation may do, but it simply declares what the sovereign power has delegated to its courts to do, and it says that "no attainder of treason," that is, an attainder of treason judicially declared, "shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." Instead of that measuring the sovereignty, it measures what the sovereignty has delegated to the courts; and yet the American mind has got so befogged by English precedents that it does not construe that right either. There was a great struggle in England on this subject, where the Government was oppressive, and convictions of treason were easily obtained, and for very trifles. The humanity of the English heart, working through acts of Parliament, was constantly ameliorating that, and introducing provisions tending to restrain the ferocity of such judges as Jeffries.

Now, take the proposition we have before us. What do we find all over the country? I was at a clam-bake at Newport a few years ago; and, by the way, had a very pleasant time. I see that my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] has gone. But what did I see in that beautiful city of Newport besides the clam-bake? By the way, I was induced to go to the clam-bake because I thought of all the festive occasions that could ever be got up eating clams was one that could be done without making a speech, but I was mistaken. [Laughter.] A long speech was a part of the entertainment of the clam-bake. Well, sir, at that time when I was in Newport I saw some of the most magnificent residences, spacious and large, evidently the production of great wealth and taste in the town of Newport, and I inquired who lived there, who owned such a house; and they told me it was a traitor or rebel in Georgia, another one in another State, another one in another State; and I found that a very large portion of that beautiful city of Newport was owned by traitors in arms against this Government, and I presume it is to this day; and I do not believe there has been one of them confiscated or touched. Probably they rent higher than they used to do, for Newport is becoming more fashionable every day, and the fashionable people that go to Newport—my friend from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] with his great wealth, when he has occasion to go there and spend it very probably hires a cottage or a house or palace, and pays the rent which goes to fight his own country, because we have not confiscated them. This corruption of blood and attainder and these hard words that are in this clause that I have read have frightened the officials of the United States from carrying into execution the plainest provisions of the law that we have made, and they not only will not confiscate this property, but they will not take it during the man's natural life, and there it is. I presume what is true of Newport is true of the country all over.

The argument of humanity of the Senator from Pennsylvania goes just exactly as hard against confiscating the life estate as against confiscating the whole. The question of humanity is just as much valid in the one case as in the other. If we have no right to take the property and take the fee, we have no right to take the use of it—not the slightest. Now, sir, what is this right? It seems to have been considered by most of the gentlemen who have addressed the Senate that all the powers this nation has got it gets under the Constitution. No such thing, sir. If that were the case we should be in the condition of the Episcopal minister who was called upon to pray with a man who had been gored by a bull. He turned the prayer-book over and over from end to end and found no prayer for a man gored by a bull, and he told the man he could not pray for him, as there was nothing of that sort in the prayer-book. [Laughter.] Just so it is here. We suppose that all the powers that this nation has got are prescribed in the Constitution. Have we no necessary powers as a nation, as a sovereignty, for our own preservation, and must we have a form prescribed for us before we can move? Can we not pray unless there is a set form given us, and all the circumstances set out? Why, sir, in my humble judgment, and I speak it with great deference to the wiser men around me, a more absurd and nonsensical proposition never was uttered. I tell you, sir, there are hardly any of the powers of this nation to be found in this Constitution. This Constitution is a covenant or agreement among the different members of the Confederacy to constitute them as one people, and telling how the power shall be exercised.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me one moment.

Mr. HALE. To-morrow morning, not to-night. This doctrine that we cannot take the estates of rebels, that we cannot confiscate them, would result in this absurdity: take for instance these handsome estates in Newport; their owners are fighting against us, taking their rents to arm armies to destroy the nation, overthrow our liberties, and ruin the country; and according to this doctrine we must preserve their estates, see that the tenants do not commit waste upon them, hold them safe, not touch them, and if by and by the rebellion should happen to be over and the country should be saved, we must institute a commission to roam anywhere and everywhere to find out where are the descendants of these traitors, that they may come and take this property and hold and enjoy it, and we must not exercise this power because there is no such case as this exactly put down in the Constitution. That is what this doctrine would lead to.

Mr. President, the Constitution never contemplated such a time, such an occasion, such circumstances as we are now living in. Instead of consulting the precedents of a dead past for wisdom to guide us in contingencies which they never thought of, we ought to be making precedents to guide our children in coming generations for just such a time as this if it should ever come again. We ought to see, to meet, to understand and appreciate our condition, and when an emergency occurs consult common sense clear and plain, instead of hunting in the musty folios of the dead past to gather wisdom for a state of things that the dead past never dreamed of.

I heard a great deal said on this subject when it was up before; and when we undertook to legislate in regard to the manner in which this war should be carried on, I believe my learned friend from Pennsylvania, as well as some other gentlemen not now members of the Senate, undertook to limit the powers of Congress in that respect, because the Constitution said the President should be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. So he is. How much authority does that confer upon the President? Just exactly as much as that article in the constitution of the State of Maine which says the title of the Governor shall be "his excellency," and no more. The mode by which the Commander-in-Chief was to be appointed or chosen was settled in the Constitution. Suppose the Constitution had said that the Senate should appoint a Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and the Senate had appointed him. Does the fact that the Senate appointed him exclude Congress from exercising control over him, saying what he shall do and what he shall not do, measuring his duties and prescribing them? Not in the least. Suppose it had said that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy should be chosen by joint vote of the House of Representatives and Senate, would Congress be prohibited then from legislating and making rules and regulations for him and governing him just as they would any other officer? Not the least. All that the Constitution does is simply to come in and say to Congress and the President and the Senate, "We will relieve you from this trouble, and whoever the people choose for President shall, in virtue of that election, be Commander-in-Chief of your Army; but you may limit and prescribe his duties, regulate and restrain them just exactly as much as if he was chosen in any other possible way that you can imagine."

Mr. President, I suppose we shall get through this rebellion, because there has never been a war in the world before that has not ended some way or other, and I suppose that this will end some time or other; and when it ends, if we find ourselves independent of these absurd dogmas and ridiculous constructions of the Constitution that we have inherited as a sort of heir-loom from our English ancestors, I shall think we have done a great deal, perhaps not quite so much as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks we should have done, if we get rid of negro slavery; but I tell you we shall have done a great deal if we can come up to the standard of independent, sensible, clear-minded, thinking men.

It seems to me that the amendment now before the Senate is exceedingly plain, and that this is a good place to put it on. If it hurts the feelings of my friend from Massachusetts to have his bill saddled with something he does not think germane to it, let him remember that he has practiced that same thing a great many times this session on some other bills, and has put measures on bills that some of our friends did not think entirely and totally germane to the subject. But, sir, this is germane. If you are in earnest, do something, and do not pretend that you are doing something when you are doing nothing. If you mean to keep property for these rebels, I suggest to my friend from Massachusetts to put another section in his freedmen's bill, and have a bureau to take care of the estates of traitors, and keep them safe during the war, so that when the war is over they may be handed over without waste to the widows and children that my friend from Virginia feels so much for, and that these commissioners shall be called upon to render a true account of their stewardship, to see that they have kept safely the trust that was committed to them.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have talked as well as my friend from Massachusetts or my friend from Illinois; I do not think I have; but we all have our way; we all talk according to the light that we have; and, as an old Quaker woman once said to me, "If we do not all have light alike each must walk in his own light," [laughter.] and that is the course I have determined for myself. I do not mean to say anything personally offensive, but I must say, with great deference to others, that more arrant nonsense was never uttered on any subject on earth than has been uttered upon this construction of the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, we are at war. A great many people do not believe that yet. I remember that less than two years ago my friend from Maine [Mr. Morrill] made one of the most eloquent speeches that he ever made—and that is saying a good deal, for he always makes eloquent speeches—to prove that we were actually at war. Gentlemen did not believe it then, and they hardly believe it now. They think there is a sort of insurrection, or insubordination, or something of that sort going on down South, they do not exactly know what. But, sir, I will tell you, and then I shall sit down and let the Senate adjourn, if they want to do so.

Mr. SUMNER. Vote.

Mr. HALE. Or vote, either; but I shall expect a speech now from my friend from Massachusetts, because he says "vote." [Laughter.]

I tell you, sir, if the North would wake up to the fact that we were at war, if the northern heart and the northern mind were all united in the only purpose that should govern men and patriots in this crisis of our fate, if they would come up to the first duty of patriotism in this struggle, it would be but an insurrection, and we could hand it over to the constables and sheriffs and grand juries before the frosts of autumn had seared the leaves of the forest that are now green around us. It has attained its present dimensions because we are not united, because our enemies know that we are not united; they calculate upon it; and our divisions are their strength.

Mr. President, there is a presidential election soon coming on. God only knows what the result will be. We can all hope and trust. None of us know what it will be, but I wish here to state my position. Perhaps it is of very little consequence for anybody to know. Those who do not want to know may go home and go to bed. [Laughter.] Sir, if this Administration should be overthrown at the coming election, the labors of no inconsiderable portion of my life would be gone, the dream of my life would be over, the hope of my life would be blighted, and I should feel, however it might be with others, that to me life had been a mistake in one of the great elements of my action.

But, sir, sad as it would be to all my hopes, blighting as it would be, I would rather see that than see the overthrow of constitutional liberty in this land. I trust that when we see the great stake for which we are contending, the immense issues that are pending, the tremendous consequences that are to affect not only us but the generations that are to come after us; when we see that we are trying to-day the great issue of human existence, solving the great problem which God in His providence has given to man to solve at this time, we may have more energetic, more earnest, more united counsels than we have ever had, and that with renewed energy of purpose we may buckle on our armor for the great contest which we have hardly yet appreciated.

Having said this I owe an apology to the Senate for having spoken when they all wanted to speak themselves instead of hearing me, [laughter.] I say I owe an apology for having detained them so long at this late hour of the night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The clock tells us that it is about time to adjourn, I should suppose, and the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire I think also tells us that we ought to adjourn. That Senator says that while the able speeches we have heard were being made he took a good sound sleep, and yet he went on to say that he had never heard so much nonsense in all his life. [Laughter.] I am sure the Senator would not have used that language if he had been awake all the time; and I account for his expression from the fact that while he was asleep he was dreaming, and his speech, which was a very interesting one, was an answer to his own dreams. [Laughter.] I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion and let us vote.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not probable that we can close this matter to-night. There is something more to be said about it.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall not adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, June 27, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, of Boston.

On motion of Mr. GANSON, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the operation of the previous question ordered on Saturday evening on the enrollment bill. As the House is thin the Chair would suggest, if there is no objection, that we proceed with the regular order of business for Monday morning, until the gentleman from Ohio sees fit to call up the enrollment bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business this morning is the call of committees for reports, to be referred, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest that we might possibly dispose of the questions of privilege from the Committee of Elections during the morning hour, and that would keep them out of the way of more important business after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the previous question, and if the gentleman from Ohio does not call up the enrollment act, the only business in order this morning is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. DAWES. My suggestion was only for the concurrence of the House. It is a matter of no particular interest to me personally.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports, to be referred and not brought back by motion to reconsider.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. HARRINGTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a minority report on the petition of the heirs of John E. Bouligay; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL POWER OVER FOREIGN POLICY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a report, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters, and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law; and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it, and each proposition while pending and undetermined is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.

The report and resolution were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. On the first occasion that presents itself I shall ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time. The resolution goes upon the Calendar.

Mr. COX. When will it come up?

The SPEAKER. It will only come up by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will it be open to discussion on the motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. That would depend entirely on whether the gentleman from Maryland should move the previous question after the rules were suspended.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would inquire whether it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is my purpose to ask a vote on the resolution, which can only be done by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. COX. I would like to know whether the gentleman expects to allow any debate on this subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I shall interpose no objection to it; but I suppose the House will probably be too impatient to give it much consideration, although I am very anxious to hear what my honorable friend from Ohio has to say upon it.

HORACE YATES.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Horace Yates; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to make an explanation. When we were about to adjourn on Saturday, the enrollment bill being under consideration, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Washburne] moved the previous question on the bill and amendments. I then made the suggestion that the previous question should be applied to the amendments only, and I requested that they might be printed. I find that everything has been printed except the principal amendment pending, my substitute for the bill. I am informed by the Clerk that perhaps it can be printed in an hour, and it seems to me important that it should be printed before we proceed with any action on the bill.

THE SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that some hours before the previous question was moved the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and some other gentlemen suggested that various amendments, which they designed to offer, in case the previous question should not be called on Saturday, should be printed, and that understanding was had. The Chair does not recollect any other order to print.

Mr. SCHENCK. I certainly understood that all the amendments were to be printed; I myself suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that they ought to be printed. I now move that they be printed and returned in one hour.

THE SPEAKER. The order to print will be made, but the Chair cannot say how soon they will be returned.

EZEKIEL DARLING.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Ezekiel Darling; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH PIKE.

Mr. ROSS, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Joseph Pike; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL S. BINGHAM.

Mr. ROSS, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Samuel S. Bingham, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

E. WOODWARD AND G. CHORPENNING.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpennning; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. WHALEY, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the several petitions of John Logan, Thomas K. Corn, Sarah Smith, of Missouri, Henry Silver, Frederick Sheridan, Mrs. James Yates, and William Wallace; and the same were laid on the table.

TREASURY PERMITS.

THE SPEAKER announced the business next in order to be the call of States for resolutions, under which the resolution submitted on Monday last by Mr. INGERSOLL would come up for consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House all permits heretofore issued by the Treasury Department to any person or persons, allowing such person or persons to trade within the limits of any States now or heretofore in rebellion, should at once be revoked and no more issued.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to postpone that resolution for ten days.

THE SPEAKER. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered on Monday last. The vote ordering the main question was however reconsidered subsequently, and the question now recurs on ordering the main question. If the main question shall be voted down, the motion to postpone will then be in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the main question will be voted down.

The main question was not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to postpone for ten days.

On the motion to postpone, 50 voted in the affirmative and 41 in the negative.

Mr. MALLORY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I propose to withdraw the motion to postpone and debate the resolution.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this resolution having been presented on Monday last, the rule which requires resolutions presented under this call and debated to go over does not apply.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will then insist on the motion to postpone.

Mr. MALLORY called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE, and WASHBURNE of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty, a further count not being demanded.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 60, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eliot, Garfield, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, William Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Law, Littlejohn, Marvin, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Strouse, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wilder, and Windom—72.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Boyd, Brooks, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Edén, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kernan, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Mallory, McClurg, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pruyn, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scofield, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Thomas T. Davis, Driggs, Dumont, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kalfleisch, Kasson, King, Longyear, Marey, McAllister, Middleton, Leonard Myers, Perham, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Sweet, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—50.

So the resolution was postponed for ten days.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was postponed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

THE SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the conscription bill, but the Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that at his request the substitute presented by him has been sent to the printer. If, therefore, when the House arrives at that point, the amendment of the gentleman is not here, a vote cannot be taken on it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will then for the present withdraw my call for the regular order.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. ROBINSON introduced the following resolution, on the adoption of which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund, to Charles W. Carrigan and John Kline, contestants and claimants to seats in this House, whose claims have been adversely decided, the usual mileage and salary to date of such adverse decisions respectively.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Is it in order to call for a division of the question, so that the vote may be first taken on the case of Mr. Carrigan?

THE SPEAKER. As the resolution is drawn it would not be in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 61, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Edén, Edgerton, Eldridge, Ganson, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Shannon, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, English, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Kasson, Kelley, King, Longyear, Middleton, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Perry, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Stevens, Voorhees, Webster, Wilder, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—46.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF THE MILITARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the House of Representatives did on the 22d day of March, 1864, authorize the Committee on Military Affairs to increase the compensation of their clerk: Therefore,

Resolved, That said increase shall commence with the present session and be paid to said clerk while actually employed.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT PILLOW REPORT.

Mr. NORTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and, under the rules, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House, in addition to the copies already ordered, one hundred and sixty thousand copies of the report of the joint committee on the conduct of the war relating to the Fort Pillow massacre and the cruelties inflicted upon our soldiers while in the hands of the enemy as prisoners of war.

ILLINOIS QUOTA.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the people of the several States not in rebellion have equal interests in the attainment of every legitimate aim and purpose of the existing war, and should therefore bear equally the burdens of its prosecution; and whereas the State of Illinois has fully complied with all demands of the Government of the United States by promptly furnishing all quotas of troops called for, with many thousands in excess, and further demands will greatly prejudice her agricultural and other industrial interests: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the judgment of this House that until the other States have furnished troops in their just proportion to the number furnished by the State of Illinois, no further demands for troops ought to be made upon said State.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I would like to have Wisconsin included.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would also like to have Indiana included.

The House divided on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 25, noes 66.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WILSON proposed to debate the resolution, and it went over.

DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the officers of this House having authority to employ others connected with the House ought to give the preference in making their appointments, other things being equal, to disabled soldiers, who have been permanently disabled while in the military service of the United States in the line of duty, and honorably discharged; and that the officers of this House in making future appointments be governed by the principle above expressed.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

JOHN S. PHELPS, OF MISSOURI.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to settle and pay the accounts of John S. Phelps, of Missouri, as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIST OF SURGEONS.

Mr. LAW submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to furnish to this House a list of the surgeons and assistant surgeons of the Army and of surgeons of volunteers holding commissions from the President, together with such statements as will show how long they have severally served in the field since 1861, in what positions they have so served, and what positions they now hold; also, if having previously served as surgeons or assistant surgeons under commissions from Governors of States, the length of such service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected, and the resolution went over.

DIGEST OF ELECTION CASES.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized to place at the use of the person employed by the Committee of Elections to make a digest of election cases a set of the Congressional Globe for the period of time covered by said resolution.

EMPLOYÉS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GANSON moved that the rules be suspended in order to introduce a joint resolution giving additional compensation to the employés of the two Houses of Congress.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 52.

So, two thirds not voting in favor thereof, the rules were not suspended.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That thirty-five hundred extra copies of the report on the New York custom-house be printed for the use of the members of this House.

LAND CLAIMS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. HARRINGTON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be and is directed to procure copies of the field-notes, maps, lines, and surveys of Andry, surveyor general of Louisiana, contained in a record of the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. D'Autrieve et al.; and that such copies be attached to the minority report in this case; and that the expenses be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I desire to say one word in reference to that resolution. A majority report has been filed in the case of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, claiming half a million acres of land. The minority have filed a minority report. In the majority report the surveys of Andry, surveyor general of Louisiana, are not referred to at all, and the minority understand that those surveys settle the case against the claimants. It is impossible to come to a correct conclusion without those surveys, and hence I ask that they be obtained and attached to the minority report.

No objection being made, the resolution was introduced, and agreed to.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage an act (S. No. 332) to establish salaries for postmasters, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

Mr. ALLEY. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

That the Senate had also agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill of the House (No. 495) to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company.

That the Senate has passed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

An act (No. 121) for the relief of Lieutenant William P. Richner, seventy-seventh regiment Ohio volunteer infantry;

Joint resolution (No. 101) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register; and Joint resolution (No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department.

That the Senate has passed an act (H. R. No. 527) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865; and an act (H. R. No. 540) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes, severally with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

That the Senate also had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (No. 315) in relation to the sale of reservations of the public lands;

An act (No. 334) for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr., artist in the Japan expedition; and

An act (No. 335) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia.

Mr. NOBLE asked unanimous consent to report back with an amendment from the Committee on Patents, a bill (S. No. 112) for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk, deceased.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The bill, which was read, authorizes Phebe Ann Fisk, as executrix of Almond D. Fisk, deceased, who obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement in coffins, dated November 14, 1848, for fourteen years, which has now expired, to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the patent for seven years, under the rules and regulations now in force for the extension of patents, as if she had made application previous to its expiration, as required by law; and the Commissioner is directed to investigate and decide the application for extension on the same evidence and in the same manner as other applications for extension are decided, notwithstanding the surrender and reissue of March 6, 1850, provided the application for extension be made within thirty days from the approval of the act, and the decision of the Commissioner be rendered within ninety days from the filing of the application in the Patent Office; and provided also that nothing in the bill shall be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any persons who may have manufactured coffins containing the aforesaid improvements between the expiration of the patent and the approval of the act.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to know if that is not a bill for extending the patent of a metallic coffin, thus putting an additional tax upon the blood and ashes of our soldiers. I object to it.

Mr. NOBLE. I move to suspend the rules to allow me to report it back.

The rules were not suspended.

NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building; which received its several readings, was engrossed, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

Mr. HALE asked unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) in relation to the claims of Carmack & Ramsey, with Senate amendments thereto.

Objection being made,

Mr. HALE moved to suspend the rules.

The rules were not suspended.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the amendments of the Senate to the tariff bill for action in the House now.

No objection was made, and the report was received.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence in some of the amendments, non-concurrence in others, and concurrence in others with amendments. The amendments have been printed, and I suggest that in order to save time the Clerk read over the amendments, and that in the case of those upon which separate votes are not demanded the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means be considered as concurred in.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

No objection was made.

The amendments of the Senate were then read over, and the recommendations of the Committee of Ways and Means in regard thereto were concurred in, except in the cases in which special action was called for, and which are indicated below.

Seventeenth amendment of the Senate:

Page 7, line twenty-eight, strike out "80" and insert in lieu thereof "60;" so that the clause will read:

On all iron imported in bars for railroads and inclined planes, made to patterns and fitted to be laid down on such roads or planes without further manufacture, 60 cents per one hundred pounds.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. WILSON. I call for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The House understands this amendment. By the bill as it passed the House a duty was laid upon imported railroad iron equivalent to the tax imposed by the internal revenue bill upon the domestic manufacture. The Senate propose to reduce the duty, so that there will actually be a less duty upon it than the tax imposed upon the domestic article.

I know that it is contended that the railroad iron establishments are not able to produce enough to supply the ordinary demand, but it seems to me that that is not an argument for the reduction of the duty. So far as I am informed, I believe that a reduction of the duty would not be for the benefit of railroad companies that are building new roads at the West at the present time, but for the benefit of the contractors who have engaged in them, and that it will merely enhance the profits of those contractors. I think it would be manifestly unfair and unjust at this time, when we are imposing burdens upon those who produce railroad iron at home, that we should reduce the duty on the iron that comes from abroad.

I thought in 1861 that the tax placed on railroad iron was a high one; but experience has proved that it has not prevented the introduction of foreign iron into this country. A large amount has been imported under that tariff; and if the rate as proposed by the House should be adopted, it will only be the same amount of competition that existed prior to the levying of the internal tax, and prior to the last modification of the tariff.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I hope the House will concur with the Senate in their amendment to this bill. It should be remembered by every member of the House that in fixing our policy of taxation upon the great interests of the country, we should not so burden them as utterly to overturn and destroy any of the great interests which are called upon to contribute to sustain the Government.

Now, sir, but for the construction of the New York and Erie canal in the first place, and but for the construction of the great railroad lines from the Atlantic coast to the great West, the States of Iowa, Minnesota, and their sister States in the West would not have been in existence to-day. It is for the interest of the Government to build up that mighty West; it is for the interest of the Government to build up and create new States and new interests of taxation. That result cannot, however, possibly follow if the provision of the House bill virtually prohibiting the importation of iron is adhered to.

Now, sir, I do not propose to detain the House long upon this question. It is one of great importance, one that affects the whole country, and one which largely affects the revenues of the Government. Who does not know that with one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty dollars a ton duty upon railroad iron the construction of railroads in this country, except so far as contracts have been made, must be stopped, for it will be impossible to import a ton of iron under such a duty. The whole system of new railways in the far West must be stopped; ay, sir, the Pacific railroad itself will be suspended if iron is to cost from $130 to $160 a ton.

If railroads in the past have been able barely to divide six per cent. upon their stock when iron was bought at $60 per ton, I ask any man in the House to inform me how a railroad can be constructed with iron from $130 to $160 per ton.

Now, sir, the entire capacity of the rolling mills of the country does not exceed three hundred thousand tons a year, an amount not at all beyond what is required for the roads already constructed; for on the average ten per cent. of track has to be relaid every year. The entire manufacture of the country will therefore be required by the roads already constructed, to keep them in running order.

I hope, therefore, for the reasons I have mentioned, and for the additional reason that I believe the House should not prohibit the importation of any article, and particularly the article of railroad iron, so much demanded and needed to forward great interests of the country, that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman who has just addressed us shows how much he knows upon the subject. I have here the returns of the rolling mills of the United States, showing their exact capacity, which I obtained last week, supposing that some gentleman might volunteer an assertion of this kind. They show that when the war commenced the capacity of the rolling mills of the country was one hundred and forty-eight thousand tons a year. To-day it is not less than six hundred and fifty thousand tons. So much for the fact which the gentleman knows. If it had not been for this duty upon the imported article there would not have been a rolling mill now in operation. And now when our citizens have gone into this description of manufacture, increasing by threefold the capacity of the mills of the country, it is gravely proposed here—and a majority of the Senate have voted for the proposition—to destroy that entire branch of industry and give the whole trade to the European market. I am aware that some gentlemen from the State of the member who has just taken his seat, large importers of iron, have been here lobbying and have induced the Senate to vote for this amendment. But, sir, if you are to take the duty off from railroad iron why not take it off from all other manufactured articles? During the present session we have laid an additional tax upon the iron manufactured in this article of $6 per ton, and now it is proposed to change the duty upon the imported article so as to make it actually less than it is under the old law.

Sir, the adoption of the amendment of the Senate, while it consults the interests of a few importers, strikes down a great branch of industry, and will not advance the interests of the railroads one dollar. These rolling mills were started upon the faith of the Government that a sufficient duty should be levied for their protection; and if this amendment is to be adopted it were better that they had never been called into existence. While we are giving every encouragement that we can to these railroads, we ought to take care that other great interests of the country are not affected and broken down.

The gentleman, in another point, has shown that he is not able to consider this question. He says that if the Senate amendment be not concurred in the Pacific railroad will not be able to proceed. Now, the Pacific railroad, by its unchanged original charter, is obliged to use American iron. It must use American iron or it cannot be built at all. How then is it to be affected by this provision?

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. As we advance foreign iron do we not advance American iron?

Mr. STEVENS. You will break down the American rolling mills, and thus advance the price of foreign iron.

I know that there are some railroads who desire this amendment; but why should railroads with $5,000,000 of capital be more favored than the farmer who buys his plowshare, or the mechanic who buys his tools? I will say that this is a proceeding not calculated to bring the railroads into much esteem in this Government.

As it seems to be the wish of the House, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 65, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William C. Brown, Chandler, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cravens, Dawson, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, LeBlond, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marey, Marvin, McDowell, McClude, McKinney, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perlman, Finck, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvey, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Briggs, Eliot, Frank, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kerian, Knox, Loom, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Sathers, John B. Steele, Stevens, Siles, Strouss, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Williams, and Wilder—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Brandegee, Broomall, Clay, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dumont, Eckley, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Lazarus, Longyear, Middleton, William H. Miller, Perry, Price, Radford, Rogers, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Ward, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—35.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to add the following to the Senate amendments:

Provided, That while the present duty remains upon railroad iron no internal tax shall be collected thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point that the amendment is not in order; this is the tariff and not the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. If there is anything in the bill or amendments of the Senate relating to the collecting of internal revenue the amendment would be in order, but not otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw it until we come to one of those provisions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the Senate amendments. The previous question was not seconded.

Thirty-second amendment:

Strike out all after the word "kinds" down to and including "forty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty," in the following clause:

On pen-knives, jack-knives, and pocket-knives of all kinds, valued at $3 or less per dozen, 50 cents per dozen, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem; valued at over $3 per dozen, 50 cents per dozen, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope there will be a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection if the gentleman desires it. The committee only intended that the amendment should go to a committee of conference, where we could agree to the Senate amendment, except that we would make the ad valorem duty a little lower.

The amendment was concurred in.

Forty-third amendment:

On page 16, line thirty-nine, strike out "double" and insert "four times;" so that the clause will read:

That wool which shall be imported scoured shall pay, in lieu of the duties herein provided, four times the amount of such duties.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope that amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL. The original bill provided an increased duty of 50 per cent. upon scoured wool, and it was amended in the House so as to double the duty. I think that certainly is sufficient. If the wool is scoured its increased value is from 30 to 40 per cent., and if the duty is increased four times, it will manifestly be entirely prohibitory. Therefore I hope the amendment will not be concurred in. Under former laws importers have had the right to import wool in the ordinary washed state. The object of this amendment was to exclude its being scoured entirely free from grease. Wool when washed shrinks 30 or 40 per cent., and when it is scoured it shrinks 30 or 40 per cent. more; so that a double duty will cover the case.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not think a double duty is sufficient, and I will move to amend the Senate amendment by inserting "three times" in place of "four times."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Fifty-ninth amendment:

Strike out the following:

On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for, 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The committee recommended concurrence.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the Senate amendment by inserting in lieu of what is proposed to be stricken out the following:

On shirts, drawers, and hosiery, of wool, or of which wool shall be a component material, 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Seventieth amendment:

Insert on page 23, after line fifty-eight, the following: And provided further, That no cotton goods having more than 200 threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, shall be admitted to a less rate of duty than is provided for goods which are of that number of threads.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend the Senate amendment by adding thereto the following proviso:

And provided further, That 50 per cent. of all duties and rates of duty imposed by the provisions of this act may be paid in legal-tender or Treasury notes.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not germane to the subject-matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. In this bill the Chair thinks the House might change the whole system of paying duties, and provide that they all shall be paid in the lawful money of the United States instead of gold and silver.

Mr. NELSON. I offer this amendment for the simple reason that the people and Congress have endeavored to their utmost to lower the price of gold in the public market.

We are at all times told that if the demand for any particular article be decreased, its price in the open market will necessarily be reduced. The great reason of the increase in the price of gold is that the merchants of New York and other ports require gold to pay their import duties. If they could pay them in the public money of the United States—paper money—the price of gold would be depreciated in proportion, for gold is to-day nothing but a commodity in this country.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN O. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 208.

It may be suggested, Mr. Speaker, that the adoption of this proviso would reduce the rates of duties imposed by this act. That is true; but that difficulty may be obviated by an amendment to the amendment which I propose, providing that all duties provided in this bill shall be increased 25 per cent. I have not much knowledge of finance, but it strikes me that the payment in gold of one half the customs duties will supply the wants of the Government, and that the receipt of the other half in paper money will decrease the demand for gold and diminish its price, while the Government can obtain an equal amount of revenue by an increase of the rates.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the inexperience of my friend from New York, I think there is enough in his argument to require something to be said in opposition to his amendment, and to show its impropriety. In the first place it would be necessary to go through the entire bill and alter all the rates of duties.

Mr. NELSON. That can be done by a general provision.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the proposition is mischievous in another direction. If it should be adopted we would, of course, have to abandon all idea of paying the interest on our public securities in coin; for unless the Government obtained coin in payment of duties it would be utterly impossible to fulfill the obligations already incurred by law. I trust that, at this late hour of the session, the labor will not be imposed upon us of going through the entire tariff and revising it so as to fit it to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first on Mr. Nelson's amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the amendment by inserting as follows:

That the legal currency of the United States shall be received in the collection and payment of all duties imposed by this bill, and by all other existing laws to raise revenue.

Mr. NELSON. To meet one of the objections raised on the other side, I will move to amend by adding "and that the rates of duties imposed by the provisions of this act are hereby increased 100 per cent."

Mr. COX. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. My object is to cut down the protective points of this bill. The duties are now payable in gold and silver. I want to have them made payable in gold and silver, or else to have the rates cut down. I have already addressed the House on this subject. I believe that the rates of duties in this bill range from 90 to 250 per cent. If the duties are made payable in paper money it will be a saving of some 150 per cent. to the people, which now goes into the pockets of a special class. That is the object of my amendment. Of course it will be voted down.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio that it is the identical amendment passed upon before.

The SPEAKER. It is not the same. The other was that half the duties should be paid in legal tenders.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, it is rather too warm to make speeches for buncombe, and I suppose that the very absurdity of the proposition will be enough to insure its rejection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I did not propose to make a speech; and the gentleman from Vermont does not treat me with much courtesy when he insinuates that I speak for buncombe. I made my speech the other day. I offered my amendment for the purpose of striking out the immense bounty allowed now to a special class—the manufacturers of the United States. I do not wish to make any speech now for any special purpose of buncombe. I simply ask the vote of the House on this proposition, and I state plainly that my object is to strike off this large protective bounty for the benefit and encouragement of a special class of manufacturers. I will leave to the gentleman from Vermont any buncombe he can make out of this sort of business.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the previous question.

Mr. COX. That is the most sensible thing he has done this session.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to ask the gentleman from Ohio one question?

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield for one question.

Mr. WARD. I will ask him if this proposition would not operate disadvantageously to those gentlemen who have imported largely and paid the duties in gold?

Mr. COX. I would say to the gentleman that the proposition is not made for the benefit of any class of importers. It is made in the interest of the great masses of the people of the United States, who are the consumers of all the commodities imported into the country. I stand here for the poor man, although that may be accounted buncombe. I stand here for the great masses of the people, who have to pay these taxes indirectly and insidiously into the pockets of these manufacturers. I stand here to defend that class of people who cannot combine to send delegations to Congress to make known their interests.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire now to satisfy the gentleman from Ohio by repeating the only sensible thing I have done. If I could with equal truth say that he had done a single sensible thing, I would do so. I call the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; being first upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Cox to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 107, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Mallory, Marcy, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, John O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Chilton A. White, and Fernando Wood—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asael W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubburd, Hutchings, Ingalls, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McElmurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Peckham, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—107.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ashley, Bailly, Broomall, Clay, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hall, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lazar, Longyear, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Sutes, Stuart, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—41.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Is a further amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the main question having been ordered.

The amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. WINFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbers thirty-one and thirty-two, in regard to pen-knives and jack-knives.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Chair that those amendments were agreed to under the operation of the previous question, and that therefore debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken as to that. The previous question was not called on those amendments.

Mr. WINFIELD. My only desire is that those propositions shall be committed to the committee of conference, if there is to be one. Certain amendments were proposed when the bill was before the House, which met with my assent, and I desire now that this matter may go to a committee of conference in order that these amendments may be considered by them; and I am willing to be bound by the judgment of that committee. I hope, therefore, in order to correct what I think was a misunderstanding this morning, that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate will be adopted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, I have no doubt, regards it as a very pleasant thing to dispose of this amendment by getting it before a committee of conference, and practically beyond the reach of the House. But, sir, the House has passed upon this question, has acted upon it deliberately, and has concurred in the Senate amendment, and I do not think there will be any fairer or better understanding of it by going back and acting upon it again. This may seem to some a matter of no importance, but, sir, pen-knives are an article of universal use, and the duty imposed by the House bill upon a knife costing two, three, or five cents, would amount to two, three, or four hundred per cent. And when the consumption of this article is so great that it cannot be supplied by the manufacturers in this country, I can see no reason why the House should reconsider its vote for the purpose of laying a heavier tax upon it.

There is one other point in connection with this matter. I presume the gentleman from New York has had an opportunity of being before the Senate committee, and perhaps of being before the House committee, and of representing there the action he desired in this respect. I presume the matter has been looked into and considered not only by the committees of the two Houses but by the House itself. The Committee of Ways and Means made no objection to concurring in the Senate amendment, and for the purpose of disposing of the matter I will now move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WINFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion to allow me to say a single word.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I think the subject is exhausted. [Laughter.]

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table—ayes 57, noes 41.

The following amendment, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence, was read by the Clerk:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That before any invoice shall be certified by a consul, vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States, as is required by the first section of an act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, samples of the goods embraced in such invoice shall be deposited with such consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, except where, from the nature of the goods, such deposit is impracticable.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to call the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to this amendment, which requires samples of goods to be imported to be deposited with the consul, or vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States at the port from whence it is shipped. I can hardly understand the object of that amendment. I think it must have been suggested by some consul at Paris, at Lyons, or at Geneva, by a consul perhaps at Paris whose wife wanted a silk dress deposited, or by a consul at Geneva who wanted a deposit of a gold watch, or by a consul at Canton who wanted a deposit of a Cashmere shawl of two, three, or five hundred dollars value. I can scarcely imagine any object in it except as a matter of speculation for consuls. I am very glad the Committee of Ways and Means have recommended non-concurrence; and I hope the committee of conference will second their recommendation.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee, after examining into the matter, came to the conclusion that it must have been recommended by the wives of consuls who wanted to secure some patch-work for themselves, and the committee determined not to recognize patch-work.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The following amendment, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence, was read:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That so much of section twenty-three of the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes, to authorize a loan, to regulate and fix the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1861, as exempts from duty all philosophical apparatus and instruments imported for the use of any society incorporated for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States, is hereby repealed. And the same shall be subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this amendment of the Senate embodies a very wise provision. I know of no reason for the exemption from the burdens of taxation of a certain class of our citizens, engaged in a very beneficial employment to be sure, but not more so than that of the laboring classes of the country. This exemption applies to a very large class of cases, to a very large amount of importations of philosophical apparatus, and it seems to me the exemption should not remain. It is not, as a general thing, for the benefit of the poorer classes of scientific institutions; it applies to a class of men who as a body are as able to pay as any other class of our citizens. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Senate, which I think to be a very wise one, will be concurred in.

The amendment was non-concurred in—ayes 24, noes 68.

The amendments of the Senate having been disposed of,

Mr. MORRILL moved that a committee of conference be asked for of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. MORRILL, Mr. FENTON, and Mr. COX as such committee on the part of the House.

COMPENSATION OF PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. This is but a short bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts takes precedence.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up for consideration.

The bill provides that there shall be paid, over and above the compensation now allowed by law, to every pension agent disbursing $50,000 annually, not exceeding $500 per annum for clerk hire, rent of office, and office expenses; and to every agent disbursing $100,000 annually, not exceeding $750 per annum; and for every $50,000 additional, not exceeding $250 per annum for the purposes aforesaid; provided, that in no case shall the amount of compensation to any one agent exceed the sum of $4,000.

Mr. BROOKS. It seems to me that this pension business should be transacted without any charge to the Government. During the existence of the old United States Bank this business was done through its agency, and it seems to me it should now be transacted through the national banks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. When the House understands this matter it seems to me there will be no objection to it. Under the present state of our pension business the amount paid out in our large cities, for instance New York, Albany, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Boston, &c., has largely increased, and the amount paid out in Boston this year will not probably be less than $500,000. As the law has been, no pension agent received over $2,000 salary per annum, and had to give bond for $50,000. But at present the amount paid out has so increased that bonds have now to be given for from one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand and in some cases to two hundred thousand dollars. It requires now, to transact this business in the large cities, not less than six clerks, so that the agents in the large cities who give those heavy bonds have left, after paying clerk hire, &c., only three or four hundred dollars. Under the increased business this year the $2,000 will not be enough to pay clerk hire, and the result will be that the pension agents will resign, and the business cannot be transacted.

As to the idea of managing this matter through the banks, I will say to the House that that matter has been brought to the attention of the committees of both the Senate and House, and they came to the conclusion that the banks could not manage the matter so well as these pension agents. For two months in the spring and two months in the fall the agents in the large cities will be compelled, in order to transact the business to the satisfaction of the community, to employ five or six clerks. And by this bill we simply provide for the payment of these clerks, office rent, &c., by providing that the agents shall be paid according to the amount of business transacted. We do not increase the salaries of the pension agents at all.

Now, the simple question is, are the pension agents in these large cities, who give bonds for from a hundred to two hundred thousand dollars, who transact all the business, furnish their own rent, and pay five or six clerks, to be procured for the simple salary of $2,000 a year? There is not a pension agent in any one of these large cities who would not have to resign within a very short time if we did not do something to furnish them with clerks. Scarcely a week passes but letters are received from parties in the cities, who have business to be transacted with these agencies, complaining that they cannot get it done without great delay. The Commissioner of Pensions says that it is impossible, under the provisions now made for their expenses, for the agents to furnish clerks to transact the business expeditiously. This bill has received the sanction of the Pension Committees of both Houses, and the Commissioner of Pensions approves it. I think no gentleman who examines the subject can object to it.

Mr. COX. I will ask the gentleman whether the pension agents themselves have in their control and possession the money which they pay out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. They do, and they have to give bonds for it.

Mr. COX. They keep it and use it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No, they cannot use it.

Mr. COX. They put it on deposit.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is mistaken. The money is not long in their hands. The money is never in their hands for more than sixty days, and if they have sufficient force, and the business is done as it ought to be, it is all paid over in thirty days.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not intend to oppose this bill if the existing system is to be kept up. I have no doubt that from the increasing number of pensions and the increased responsibilities devolved upon the agents an additional compensation will in that case be necessary. I comprehend all that. I comprehend also that at this late period of the session it may be difficult, if not impossible, to introduce a new system. My main object, then, in calling the attention of the House to the subject was to suggest that prior to the next session of Congress some gentleman upon the other side of the House should prepare a bill by which the national banks shall be made responsible for this whole system of disbursing money in lieu of pension agents. The banks receive the public deposits without making any return therefor, and in addition to that they hold public bonds on which the people are paying large sums of money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The banks do not receive this pension money.

Mr. BROOKS. But the money should be deposited with the national banks. Under the old United States Bank system the pension disbursements were made through the old United States Bank with little or no expense to the Government. It is evident that in the future the disbursements will be much larger on account of the increased number of pensions, and hence the expense and responsibility will be much enhanced. I hope, therefore, that the whole system will be taken into consideration by gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and that during the next session a new system will be prepared and inaugurated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. It is impossible that any such arrangement can be made now. This bill has been very carefully considered, and I hope the House will pass it. I move the previous question.

Mr. COX. I hope that will be voted down. I desire to move to postpone the bill until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. COX. Then I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the bill on the table—ayes 24, noes 75.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate has sent back, with amendments, the civil appropriation bill and the fortification bill. I ask unanimous consent to have them referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the amendments printed?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; it is hardly necessary.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the rules be suspended to enable me to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the House on this day adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund, to Charles W. Carrigan and John Kline, contestants and claimants for seats in this House, whose claims have been adversely decided, the usual mileage and salary up to the date of such adverse decisions respectively;" and whereas said resolution authorizing the payment of the salary of said contestants from the 4th of March, 1863, to the date of the decisions in their respective cases is in conflict with the usual rate of compensation paid to contestants: Therefore, Resolved, That the resolution above recited be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not modify the resolution?

Mr. WILSON. If I can have the consent of the House I will state the object of this.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I think that gentlemen on the other side should not object to a suspension of the rules. I do not see why there should be any departure in these two cases from the usual practice in regard to the pay of contestants. I certainly voted for the resolution but did not suppose it to be a departure from the usual rule.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes 89, noes 42.

So, two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the resolution introduced.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. ODELL. I wish to make a simple statement that will be satisfactory to the House.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has been refused by the gentlemen from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania, [Messrs. ELDRIDGE and JOHNSON.]

Mr. ODELL. I ask that objection may be withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. If anybody is to make a statement, I want to make one myself.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STILES. I ask leave to modify the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STILES. I ask that unanimous consent.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I object.

The question was taken on the resolution, and it was adopted, there being, on a division—ayes 84, noes 11.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. COX. Before that question is taken I hope the resolution will be modified by unanimous consent, so as to make it conform to the pay of other contestants. Nothing else is desired.

Mr. A. MYERS. I object.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. COX. I now move that Messrs. Carrigan and Kline be paid the same as has been paid to other contestants at this session; that is, from the first Monday in December to the time when their claims were decided adversely.

Mr. A. MYERS. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that simple good faith requires us to agree to this.

Mr. COX moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. COFFROTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. NORTON and Cox were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 32.

So, two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

Mr. COX. I now move the resolution which I have indicated, and move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 62, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Francis W. Kellogg, Kegan, Knapp, Lavy, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Gooch, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Littlejohn, Loan, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, and Williams—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Dumont, Fenton, Finck, Grinnell, Hall, Hooper, Kasson, King, Longyear, McBride, Middleton, Morrill, Leonard Myers, Perry, Price, William H. Randall, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Stevens, Voorhees, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—37.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the enrollment bill, on which the main question has been ordered on the pending amendments.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to ask a question. The amendment immediately pending I understand to be that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

If that be voted down will it be in order to move further amendments to the bill, or must all the amendments to the bill be voted down before any other amendment can be offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the questions which are before the House. The question first to be taken is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to strike out the third and fourth sections. There are then pending the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and the substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

If both should be voted down it will then be in order to offer amendments to the bill. If either be adopted, however, it will not be in order to move to strike out anything that has been inserted. Motions may be made to add or to qualify, but no part of that which has been inserted can be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. If the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio be voted down, will it then be in order to offer another substitute?

The SPEAKER. Another substitute would be in order except for the previous question, which will not be exhausted until all the amendments pending shall have been disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. But if both are voted down, then further amendments will be in order?

The SPEAKER. Further amendments will then be in order either as a substitute or to perfect the original bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. But if my amendment be adopted, other amendments will still be in order by way of addition?

The SPEAKER. They will, but it will not be in order to move to strike out.

The amendment submitted by Mr. GARFIELD was disagreed to; and the question recurred on the substitute offered by Mr. SCHENCK; which was read, as follows:

Strike out Mr. BROOMALL's substitute, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, as provides for a commutation in money, to be paid by persons enrolled or drafted for military service, in lieu of actually rendering such military service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter no payment of money shall be accepted or received by the Government to release any enrolled or drafted man from obligation to perform military duty.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, at his discretion, at any time hereafter, order a draft for soldiers to serve for a less period than three years: Provided, however, That no such draft shall be for a less term of service than one year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall accompany any order for a draft of men for military service with a notice that he will accept volunteers in lieu of such drafted men prior to the day appointed for the draft, to fill the quota, or any part thereof, of any town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, or of any county not so subdivided; and every person so volunteering, in lieu of a man to be drafted, shall be credited to such town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, or county not so subdivided; and if he volunteers and is accepted and mustered into the service for a term of one year, unless sooner discharged, shall receive and be paid by the United States a bounty of $100, and if for a term of two years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $200, and if for a term of three years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $300, one half of which said bounty shall be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into the service, one fourth at the expiration of one half his term of service, and one fourth at the end of his term of service. And in case of his death when in the service, any portion of his bounty then remaining unpaid shall be paid to his legal representatives; and in case he is honorably discharged from wounds or sickness incurred in the service, while in the line of his duty, he shall receive the full bounty. And the President in any call or order for a draft shall specify the exact time of service for which such draft is to be made; and the volunteers accepted in lieu of the whole, or any part of the quotas to be provided under that draft shall be for not less than the term of service for which that draft is ordered.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, when mustered in, shall be organized into or assigned to regiments, batteries, or other organizations of their own States, and as far as practicable, shall, when assigned, be permitted to select their own regiments, batteries, or other organizations from among those of their respective States which at the time of assignment may not be filled to their maximum number.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years; and under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed from service with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for fifty per cent. in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district, as provided by said section.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, instead of traveling pay, all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation from their places of residence; and persons discharged at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation to their places of residence.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any persons resident in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, or Arkansas, who may voluntarily enlist in the military service of the United States, for a term of not more than three years, or during the war, or not less than one year, shall be entitled to the benefits and privileges of existing laws; and such persons shall be mustered into the regiments, or other organizations, of whatsoever State they may elect, or, in the case of colored troops, shall be assigned as now provided by law. And the States, or subdivisions of States, procuring such enlistments, shall receive credit for such persons, in accordance with the laws in other cases: Provided, That such enlistments as are authorized in any State, under the provisions of this act, shall only continue until such State shall have been made subject to a call for troops: And provided further, That no enlistments shall be made of any soldiers, either in or out of any State, except those enumerated herein, unless full credit is given to the State to which the enlisted soldier belongs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 91, not voting 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Garfield, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—62.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kegan, Knapp, Lavy, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Wadsworth, William B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—91.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Thomas T. Davis, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Hall, Hooper, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Longyear, Middleton, Perry, Price, Scofield, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Ward, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—29.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the call of the roll, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that Mr.

FENTON had been called out of the House by important business.

MR. FARNSWORTH stated that he had paired with Mr. J. C. ALLEN.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the substitute offered by Mr. BROOMALL.

MR. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the evening session be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

The hour of half past four having arrived, the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPH.

MR. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for action, an act (S. No. 302) to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the eastern and western continents.

The bill was read for information.

MR. F. CLARKE objected.

POST ROUTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. ALLEY, the Senate amendments to the bill of the House (No. 532) to establish certain post roads were taken from the table, and concurred in.

MR. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

MR. CHANLER introduced the following resolution; which was referred under the rule to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Printing Committee be, and hereby is, directed to cause to be printed for the use of this House ten thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, dated 12th March, 1863, and relating to our foreign and domestic commerce, including, as well, that of the Pacific coast.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD, the Senate amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to release certain goods from the payment of duties was taken from the Speaker's table for consideration.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to release and discharge the Irish national fair, recently held at Chicago, of and from all liabilities heretofore incurred for or on account of having sold goods or lottery tickets without license or stamp, and of and from the payment of all license fees, stamp duties, or penalties incurred by reason of the sales aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

MR. COX. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill of the Senate (No. 335) to carry into effect the convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia. It will take but a moment to pass it. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate that they have passed upon it, and that it is necessary that it should be passed this session.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up for consideration.

The bill provides that for the purpose of giving effect to the convention signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and the United States of Colombia on the 10th of February, 1864, extending and renewing the provision of the convention with the republic of Nicaragua of the 10th of September, 1857, the first eight sections of the act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and the republic of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, approved February 20, 1861, be renewed, reenacted, and made applicable to the said convention of the 10th of February, 1864.

The bill received its several readings, and was passed.

MR. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

MR. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the report of the special committee on the northeastern boundary be printed for the use of the House.

PATENTS FOR CERTAIN LANDS.

MR. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Lands a bill to authorize the issuing of patents for certain lands in the town of Stockbridge, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. SLOAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC FERRY COMPANY.

MR. MORRIS, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 298) to incorporate the Potomac Ferry Company.

MR. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, severally with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route; and

An act (No. 411) to encourage immigration.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.*

MR. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution, which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Printing, namely:

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, for the year 1863, be printed for the use of the Agricultural Department.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

MR. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill known as the conscription bill, the pending amendment being the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BROOMALL.

The substitute was reported, as follows:

That hereafter no person shall be received or accepted to serve in the Army of the United States as a substitute for any other person liable to military duty and who may have been enrolled or drafted for that purpose.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the term of service of all soldiers hereafter volunteering or being drafted shall be one year unless sooner discharged, and that, in lieu of all bounties, their pay shall be thirty dollars per month.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons hereafter volunteering shall be credited to the city or county in which they are liable to draft, if so liable, and if not, then to the city or county which they shall elect.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the payment of commutation money under existing laws shall exempt the person paying it from draft for one year, unless within that period all persons liable to draft in his city or county shall be drafted and mustered into service, or shall pay commutation money, in which case he shall be again liable to draft.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for fifty per cent. in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district, as provided by said section.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, instead of traveling pay, all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation from their places of residence; and persons discharged at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation to their places of residence.

The substitute was not agreed to.

MR. STEVENS. I would now inquire what there is left to act upon?

The SPEAKER. All of the original bill except the first two sections.

MR. STEVENS. I offer as a substitute for the bill what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is authorized to call into military service not exceeding five hundred thousand men, in addition to those already called for, to serve for two years, unless sooner discharged, and that if not otherwise obtained a draft may be ordered to take place within forty days, or at such time thereafter as the President may direct.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who is liable to draft and has been regularly enrolled, may purchase exemption from draft for the term of two years or until the roll is exhausted, by paying $300 at any time not less than ten days before the time fixed for such draft. Any person who may be drafted may purchase the like exemption by paying $500 at any time not less than ten days after he shall be duly notified that he is drafted. The commutation money thus paid shall go into the Treasury for the purpose of paying the bounties herein provided for.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That to enable the several States to raise the number of troops allotted to them respectively, the Governors of said States may appoint such number of recruiting officers as they may deem proper, and when companies and regiments shall be enlisted, shall commission such company and regimental officers as shall be deemed competent.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That when, in the judgment of the President, the regiments of the Army are so reduced as to require consolidation, they may be consolidated, and the supernumerary officers may be detailed for the purpose of raising new companies and regiments.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if the requisite number of soldiers shall not be raised at the first draft, a second draft may be ordered to take place within ten days, or any longer period which the President may deem proper, of the men remaining unenlisted and undrafted, and may be repeated from time to time until the full number shall be obtained.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall volunteer as a soldier and be regularly enlisted, shall receive a bounty of $500, one half thereof to be paid to him when mustered into the service of the United States, and the other half at the end of his term of service, or if honorably discharged; or if he shall be killed or die in the service before the expiration of his term of enlistment, it shall go to his widow, if there be one, and in case there be no widow, then to his children, and in case there be no widow or children, then to his personal representatives.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the rebel States to enlist soldiers, who shall be credited to the State that may procure their enlistment, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to approve the appointment of agents by the Governors of the respective States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That enrolled men may furnish substitutes either before or after they may be drafted according to the present law, who shall be accepted without regard to color, if otherwise competent.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the law with regard to persons conscientiously opposed to bearing arms shall not be altered or affected by this act, except so far as it regards the amount of money to be paid for exemptions.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President, if he shall deem it expedient, to accept the services of any number not exceeding fifty thousand volunteers, between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five, to be used for post or garrison duty, who shall be called the "Old Guard." Such soldiers when enlisted for two years, unless sooner discharged, shall be entitled to receive $100 bounty, one half to be paid on the expiration of their term, if honorably discharged; and if they should be killed or die in the service of the United States, it shall be paid to their respective widows, children, or personal representatives, in the same manner as is provided in section six of this act; and they and their heirs shall be entitled to such pensions as are now provided by law for other soldiers. When a drafted man shall claim exemption on account of physical disability the surgeon shall examine into the degree of disability. If found unfit for active field service, and fit for garrison or post service, he shall be certified accordingly and placed into the "Old Guard."

MR. CHANLER. Is it the intention of the gentleman to reduce the amount of commutation?

MR. STEVENS. The substitute says that commutation may be had, if paid before a draft, for $300; if not until after draft, for $500. But I am willing to do what the House thinks right.

MR. CHANLER. I would suggest that if the gentleman will retain the commutation provision as it now stands, there seems to be no objection to his substitute. An increase of the commutation will most likely be fatal to the measure.

MR. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I understood the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Military Committee, to say that it was men and not money that the Government wanted.

MR. STEVENS. That is not asking a question of me.

TEMPORARY DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

MR. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to give way to allow me to offer a joint resolution to which I presume there will be no objection.

MR. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. The joint resolution imposing fifty per cent. additional duties upon imports will expire to-day. It was expected the tariff bill would have passed and become a law ere this. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced and read a first and second time by its title.

The resolution continues in force the joint resolution increasing temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864, until the 1st day of July next.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION LAW—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 549, further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire, at the suggestion of several gentlemen, to modify my amendment further, by striking out $600 in the second section, and inserting in lieu thereof $500; so that it will read:

Any person who may be drafted may purchase the like exemption by paying $500 at any time not less than ten days after he shall be duly notified that he is drafted. The commutation money thus paid shall go into the Treasury for the purpose of paying the bounties herein provided for.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to have this provision so plain that exemptions by enrolled men will not be purchased up for two years. It would be a very easy matter to exhaust the enrollment in any neighborhood. The gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks he has it so provided for now. I have my doubts about it; but I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ELIOT. I have caused to be printed two sections which I desire to offer as additional sections; and, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will offer them now.

Mr. STEVENS. If my amendment be adopted, it will still be open for additions?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts can offer his as additions.

Mr. A. MYERS. I would like to see whether I understand my colleague. If his substitute be adopted in place of that offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will we then have the privilege of offering amendments to each section?

The SPEAKER. If the substitute be adopted amendments cannot be offered striking out any part of it; but additions or qualifications can be made to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg leave to inquire where we are, and whether the substitute has been offered or not?

The SPEAKER. The pending question before the House is the original bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not object to my offering these sections as additions to his substitute. I therefore ask leave to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection.

Mr. ELIOT offered the following as additional sections:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all persons in the naval service of the United States who have entered said service during the present rebellion, who have not been credited to the quota of any town, district, ward, or State, by reason of their being in said service and not enrolled prior to February 24, 1864, shall be enrolled and credited to the quotas of the town, district, or State in which they respectively reside.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That if any person duly drafted shall be absent from home in prosecution of his usual business, the provost marshal of the district shall cause him to be duly notified as soon as may be, and he shall not be deemed a deserter, nor liable as such, until notice has been given to him and reasonable time allowed for him to return and report to the provost marshal of his district; but such absence shall not otherwise affect his liability under this act.

Mr. BEAMAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to an amendment to the sixth section of his substitute. My impression is that it does not exactly produce the effect which he intended. It is in reference to the disposition of the bounty in case of the death of the person in service. It provides that in case of his death the bounty shall go to his widow or children, without determining which, and in case there shall be no widow or child, then to his personal representatives. The suggestion I make is this; that it should read thus: "To his widow, if there be one, and in case there be no widow, then to his children, and in case there be no widow or child, then to his personal representatives."

Mr. STEVENS. That is better; that makes it clearer. If the gentleman will write it out, I will adopt it in my substitute.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to offer an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is in order, I will yield.

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the original bill is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I offer the following amendment to the original bill as an additional section:

That hereafter no person shall be received or accepted to serve in the Army of the United States as a substitute for any other person liable to military duty, and who may have been enrolled or drafted for that purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I propose to amend the substitute by reducing the bounty from $500 to $300.

The SPEAKER. That will not be in order unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania accepts it.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot agree to that.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 190) to establish a navy-yard and depot at Cairo, in the State of Illinois.

Also, that the Senate have passed bills of the House of the following titles, severally with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 411) to encourage immigration;

An act (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound on the Pacific coast, by the northern route; and

An act (No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Also, that the Senate have passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. GANSON. I should like to offer an additional section to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. If it be in order I shall not object.

Mr. GANSON. I should like to offer the following as an additional section:

The commutation money realized under this act and the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and the act amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, shall be used by the War Department to procure volunteers for the district where such money was paid, and volunteers so procured shall be credited to such district.

Mr. STEVENS. There is already an amendment pending after mine, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] and I do not see how the amendment of the gentleman from New York can be received at this time. I will say, however, that if my amendment should be adopted it will then be in order to move any additional sections that are pertinent to the subject. If, however, my amendment fails, then the gentleman does not want to attach his to it.

Mr. GANSON. But if the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, I should like to have mine go with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is within his power to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York if he desires it.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that; but I would, I think, prefer that the vote should be taken upon my amendment. I hardly understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to suggest a modification to the sixth section of the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I would like to add something like this:

Or to such person or persons as he shall by his last will and testament in writing, proved by two witnesses, direct.

I desire to say that I have a case within my knowledge where a man who was suffering, had a sister who came there and attended upon him for some six or eight weeks. The chaplain and surgeon thought he might by will leave his bounty to her. He executed such a will, which of course the accounting officers of the Government could not recognize or enforce; but I see no reason why we may not permit such a man to control his bounty money if he die in the service.

Mr. STEVENS. I may say that is departing from the whole practice of the Government upon the subject. We have no reason, as long as the relatives of the soldier do not receive it, to give to a stranger the bounty which is designed personally for the soldier. That is the reason why I would not like now to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. But if the bounty is paid to him, he may dispose of it as he pleases, so that it may after all go to a stranger.

Mr. STEVENS. I will merely say that the whole practice of the Government has been different, and for that reason I would not like to venture the change in this amendment.

Now, sir, if no one else desires to suggest an amendment, I will make a very few remarks and then yield the floor to see what is to be said in opposition to my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half an hour remaining.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I will now explain briefly the points of the substitute which I have offered, and my reason for offering it. In the first place I do not think the time has come when it is absolutely necessary, arbitrarily, without recourse, to sweep our whole population into the Army as is done in the South. I believe that by voluntary action, if we are sufficiently liberal and wise, we can obtain sufficient money to raise an army and to supply all the deficiencies that may arise between this and a year hence. Hence it is that I oppose, and shall continue to oppose, the repeal of the commutation clause; but I desire that a bill shall be passed that shall be so effective, so seductive if you please, as that within the shortest possible time a large army of five hundred thousand men can be raised.

I believe, sir, that two of the chief reasons why we have not been able to raise volunteers as we did at first are these: in the first place, the Government has refused to put enlistments under the supervision of the Governors of the States, who should appoint recruiting officers and regimental officers. Our people cannot be got to go to recruiting offices and enlist to be sent they know not where, and among associates whom they do not know; whereas if they knew the officers to be their neighbors they would be much more ready to enlist. I am entirely certain that such is the case in my neighborhood. I admit that raw recruits are not quite so useful in new regiments as they would be if placed in the old regiments. But you must get recruits before you put them anywhere. And if you can get them for two years you will soon have them so mingled that they will be as useful as the old soldiers. The nine months' men, long before their term of service expired, were equal to any.

Now, what does my bill provide for? I will explain it. The first section provides for the calling out of five hundred thousand men for two years, if so long needed, and that if they are not obtained by the other means provided for in the other sections of the bill before forty days from this time, a draft shall be ordered for the purpose of obtaining them.

It provides that any man who is enrolled and liable to draft may, at any time between this and ten days before the draft, purchase exemption from that draft, or from service for two years, unless the roll shall sooner give out, when all shall be put in again, and the draft be repeated. Any man by paying $300 before the draft can purchase exemption; but if he stands the draft, if he takes his chance of being hit and is hit, he must pay $500 for the purpose of buying the same exemption.

Now, sir, there are something more than three million of national forces borne on our enrollment list. Of these, three millions and upwards, it is proposed to draft one sixth, with fifty per cent. additional, making seven hundred and fifty thousand men to be ordered to be drafted. It seems to me that a large proportion of those who wish to escape the draft will pay their $300 before the day of draft, and I have no doubt that out of the three million enrolled men, at least half of them will pay the $300 bounty before the day of draft. There may be some who will take the chance and pay the $500.

But suppose the whole million and a half pay for their exemption before draft, that will produce $450,000,000; and suppose that enough of them pay after draft to yield $50,000,000 more, there will be a fund of $500,000,000 raised, not by general taxation, but by a levy on those who are eager to pay their money, and that fund will be devoted by this bill to paying volunteers.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he provides in his bill that the payment of $300 before a draft shall exempt for the term of two years?

Mr. STEVENS. Unless the roll shall be sooner exhausted. That is added to my substitute, although it is not in the printed copy. They are to be exempted for two years, or until everybody else whose name is in the box has been drawn out; if the box is exhausted, the names of the men thus exempted are to be put into the box again, should another draft be needed.

I provide then that there shall be paid out of this fund, which I estimate at $500,000,000, a bounty of $500 to every man who will voluntarily enlist, one half when he shall be mustered into the service and the other half when he shall be discharged, or, if he be killed, then to those who represent him. Now, sir, let us see how that will operate. In the first place, the bounty of $500 will be a great inducement to men of moderate means to enlist—men who may be anxious to buy a little home for themselves, and to leave a little money with their families, and who may wish to escape the chance of being drawn; for, if drafted, their bounty will be but $100 under the existing law, while if they volunteer their bounty will be $500. Now, I put it to the common sense of all around me whether a provision of that kind held out to the community would not bring flocks of volunteers to our standard? I have no doubt that it would.

But it is further provided that if you do not obtain a sufficient number of volunteers in this way and a sufficient number of drafted men to serve, then within ten days after that draft shall be completed you shall go on and draft again to fill up the quota of five hundred thousand men, and so on, toties quoties, until the whole number is drawn. In my judgment, forty or fifty days would be a long time for it to take, under such circumstances, in which to raise the number of men provided for in this bill. I believe that this great inducement of $500 would lead men of moderate means to leave their homes for two years, and thus secure exemption from compulsory service for two years, and especially when in so enlisting they would be under the command of their own neighbors, and in companies composed of their own neighbors. It is a great inducement to men who are called upon to go forth to fight these battles that they can go with their friends and associates and neighbors. Everybody who has noticed what has taken place in the community knows that that is very often a great inducement to a man to enlist when he would not otherwise do it.

I have provided further, that when the President deems that old regiments are exhausted, he may consolidate them and send back the supernumerary officers into their neighborhoods to raise new companies and regiments, and thus a large number of drilled and disciplined officers will be retained in the service.

Mr. WILSON. I would ask the gentleman why it would not be as well to enlist men in the neighborhoods where their original companies went from to be placed in the same companies, and thus keep up the old regiments?

Mr. STEVENS. I have already said that I believe that if you send officers into a neighborhood to recruit men, without the men knowing by whom they are to be commanded, or with whom they are to be associated, you cannot get them to go, and I have seen it tried over and over again.

Mr. WILSON. My suggestion is that if sent home to recruit, they shall recruit men for the old regiments—that is, the regiments in which they hold commissions—so that the old regiments may be kept full. All your troops have a pride in the old regiments, and desire to keep up those organizations. It seems to me better to provide that men enlisted in neighborhoods from which the old companies went shall go into those companies.

Mr. STEVENS. There may be differences of opinion about these minor points. I do not expect that we can all agree about the question as to how we can raise an army in such a way as will do it quickest and do it most consistently with the genius of our Government, the feelings of our people, and with a support of the Administration. I have done the best I could in pointing out in this bill what I verily believe is the best policy that can be adopted for securing these great objects. I believe that if the men are raised so that they shall be under the command of the officers who may raise the companies or regiments, they will take a pride in it, and many of those who have been discharged from service will reenlist. For instance, there are the Pennsylvania reserves, many of whom are in my district. There are colonels and captains there, and they would at once set to work and raise companies and regiments as they did before from the same neighborhoods, adding, of course, many others to them. If there can be a better system suggested, and one which does not savor of that tyranny that our people do not like, I shall be willing to adopt it. I do not say how much the people would bear; but I fear they would bear but ill the harsh measures, as it seems to me, which are proposed in the original bill.

Now, sir, I have explained nearly all the provisions of my substitute. I have added a new feature to it which I have submitted with great deference to the House; and I should have felt a good deal less confidence in it if I had not seen the same principle contained in the amendment proposed by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] It is this, that the President shall be authorized to accept fifty thousand men between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five, who are to receive a bounty of $100, and are to be called the "Old Guard," and be employed for garrison and post duty. I know there are a great many men within my own knowledge, sound, hearty, good men, very nearly as young as I am, [laughter,] who would be very willing to serve on those conditions, and who, I think, would take a pride in it. Perhaps they would not be able to march; some of them may be a little defective in some limb, and yet they are active for all the common purposes of life, and for garrison purposes, I venture to say, would do as well as any man could. This, however, is left optional with the President; and if he thinks it a prudent measure, I think it will be very useful.

I provide still further by an amendment, which is in manuscript only, and therefore gentlemen may not have seen it, that when men are drafted and come to be examined for physical disability, the surgeon shall examine as to the degree of their disability, and although he may pronounce them unfit for field duty, for marching, yet if he deems them fit for garrison duty, if they have that kind of disability only which makes them unfit to march, he shall so certify, and without regard to their ages they are to be placed in the "Old Guard" to serve with those who are laboring under the weight of years. I think in that way that a great many men may be made available who have been discharged, who are every day about their business as actively as any man, but who have yet some blemish about them invisible to the naked eye, and never known until they were drafted. They might be very serviceable in places of this kind, and if they do not choose to serve they ought not to be allowed to escape without paying commutation.

I think, sir, that in this way an army may be raised in less than forty days, certainly in less than sixty days, which will be all that is required, and swell our Army above half a million.

I know, sir, that between now and next spring the term of service of a great many men will expire. I do not know how many, and perhaps if I did it would not be prudent to state the number. It will be necessary between then and now to fill their places for another year. If there be anything in this substitute of mine which is harsh or improper I should be glad to have it amended. I am so much opposed to raising an army at the trigger or at the point of the bayonet that I am very solicitous that this plan should be tried. There is another very important consideration connected with this matter, and that is that you should so conduct the raising of this army as not to alienate the affections of the people or provoke their hostility. I am not going to say that there would be anything like actual resistance to this law. That is a matter about which there may be difference of opinion. In some localities there would be ill feeling created and I should fear in other localities something worse. But so long as it is unnecessary to try this experiment, I beseech you not to put the people to the trial. It may be that even this measure of mine, with these high bounties, may fail to secure the requisite number of men. I do not so believe. I believe that you can get the men quicker and more satisfactorily in this way than in any other. If the number of men should pay commutation that I estimated in the first instance, then after you had paid $500 to every man of the half million, amounting to $250,000,000, you would still have $250,000,000 in the Treasury to be applied as a fund for further volunteering. I believe that of the commutation money raised under the last drafts, although the Secretary of War has been using the money profusely, paying $300 bounties and in some instances $400 bounty, there yet remains, after paying all those bounties, over five million dollars of that money in the Treasury.

Now, sir, I have submitted, candidly I trust, and as clearly as I can, my ideas upon this subject. It is an important question, and one upon which I hope no man will act factiously. I believe no man will. I believe all who are here will act with a sincere desire so to recruit our Army and so to sustain our Government as if possible to suppress this terrible rebellion and stop the bloodshed.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to have read an amendment which I wish to offer if I can to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to the amendment being read for information.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I propose, when opportunity shall occur, to offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years, under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. The House will pardon me if I should appear not in every respect to understand precisely the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He has received and accepted so many modifications, that I may not have kept the run of them; adopting so many changes, indeed, that the printed matter before us does very little to indicate the amendment as it now stands. I shall therefore, before I sit down, offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that an amendment is pending to the substitute, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] and no further amendment is in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. Without reference, then, to the course which may hereafter be pursued, I shall offer a few remarks upon the character of this new bill—for the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in the nature of an original bill—now before us.

I was somewhat struck with the course of the gentleman's remarks in which he went into a calculation to show that it was a bill by which he could raise four hundred and fifty or five hundred million dollars, while he provides in it also for expending some two, three, or four hundred millions of that sum in carrying out his system. It seemed to me while he was making his calculations that such a proposition came very appropriately from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. There is this radical difference between his view of the subject and that which I take. In representing as best I can the Committee on Military Affairs, in all my calculations and provisions it has been my object to raise men, while the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seems to have devoted himself to framing a bill by which he is to raise a large amount of money, through which he hopes to obtain men.

Mr. STEVENS. Allow me to say I remarked that while my substitute would raise this money, in my opinion it would raise more money in a shorter time than any other.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was so I understood the gentleman, and therefore it was that I could not help being struck with the large money calculations contained in the bill and the propriety there was in its coming from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as contradistinguished from the efforts which it seems to me we should rather be making in aid of those who are wielding the war power of the Government to raise men for the present emergency.

Now, sir, I propose to look a little into the details of this bill as far as I can gather them, although in consequence of the numerous alterations or modifications made I may not be able in every respect to state its provisions correctly. In the first section, at the very threshold, I find something which I am unable to understand, and to which I ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he may, if he pleases, explain to us what it means. This first section provides for calling "into military service not exceeding five hundred thousand men, in addition to those already called for, to serve for two years, unless sooner discharged, and that, if not otherwise obtained, a draft may be ordered to take place within forty days, or at such time thereafter as the President may direct."

I would inquire of the gentleman when those forty days are to begin and end. Forty days from when? From the time of the passage of the bill, or from the time when a draft is attempted to be made and the effort has been found to be a failure?

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I desire to have it construed as a lawyer would construe it. In a bill of this kind, where time is designated in this way, it is always construed to mean from the date of the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then if the men are not otherwise obtained the draft may be made in forty days.

But suppose instead of containing that clause, as its connection and the remainder of the bill would seem to require, that is, first to exhaust all efforts for recruiting and then to resort to the forty days' notice, you should count the forty days from the passage of the bill. Now, this bill cannot possibly become a law, passed by Congress and approved by the President, before about the 4th of July. Forty days from that date will bring you to the 13th or 14th of August. Is the gentleman aware that between the 5th and 25th of August the term of service of most of the hundred days' men expires? Then what does the gentleman present to us? A system for obtaining men after the time and exigency have gone by for which the men are wanted. And the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, differing from the President, differing from the Secretary of War, differing from all concerned in administering the Government in carrying on the war, says they are entirely mistaken in regard to what the emergency is, or how it is to be met; and he would have us adopt his slow and halting manner of getting men. His bill, if it gets men at all, sets out with a plan for getting them only after the time when the pressing need for them will have come, and when we shall be involved in the very emergency for which they are required.

But let us proceed. The bill says that "any person who is liable to draft and has been regularly enrolled, may purchase exemption from draft for the term of two years by paying $300 at any time not less than ten days before the time fixed for such draft." As your law now stands—the enrollment act of the last Congress, amended at the present session—the payment of $300 on any draft that may be called for secures an exemption of the party paying that sum for that call only, provided, however, that under no circumstances shall exemption be thus purchased for more than one year. Instead, therefore, of giving us a more rigorous law, the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this second section proceeds to relax the rule by which even money instead of men is to be secured. He doubles the time for which exemption can be purchased by the payment of $300. He makes the time two years absolutely instead of one. This would be helping the Government with a vengeance! Instead of a more rigorous law, the present system is to be made doubly lenient, while at the next step the gentleman would destroy the possibility of obtaining either men or money within any desirable period.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has overlooked my modification, which provides that the exemption shall only continue until the roll is exhausted.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it is so it is not so expressed in the bill. There is no such limitation, and at any rate the language used is open to loose construction hereafter. But I will pass this objection now as if removed by more precise specification in the amendment to be made.

Again, the gentleman speaks in relation to his third section as if a new discovery had been made. He says the Governors shall commission the officers of these various regiments, all field and line officers. That is a novelty indeed. Pray, who commissions them now? Who but the Governors of the several States? But the gentleman says he has improved on the existing law by providing for getting officers and men from the same neighborhood or locality. Where, I would ask him, are they now taken from except from their own proper States and neighborhoods?

So far, then, from this plan he has presented to the House being something new, it contains nothing but a reenactment of that which is the law and the fixed practice of the Government at the present time. The gentleman seems to have forgotten that, with the exception of staff and general officers, all the officers of volunteers are commissioned now by the Governors of the several States.

Mr. STEVENS. Am I to understand that under these drafts now made the Governors appoint the officers?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly. The men drafted under the present law and regulations are assigned to the regiments of their respective States. Those regiments have been raised in the several States and have field and line officers commissioned by the Governors of those States. But the gentleman says that he makes provision by which they shall be kept together. What is that provision? Why, that when, in the judgment of the President, regiments are so reduced as to require consolidation, they may be consolidated and the supernumerary officers may be detailed for the purpose of raising new companies and regiments. Is that another discovery? What do the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the existing law provide for now, except for consolidation? Only that consolidation, instead of being wholesale and of regiments, is confined to the consolidation of companies in regiments from the same State. So far, then, from this being an improvement upon the present law in this respect, the gentleman only touches it to make it more crude, more vague, and to work with more hardship on the individuals concerned. If the gentleman will take the trouble to look at those sections, nineteen and twenty of the original enrollment act, he will find consolidation provided for by specific enactment; not the consolidation of regiments, but of companies within regiments, and those to be regiments only of the same State, and that consolidation to take place when regiments have been reduced below the minimum standard.

I repeat that the gentleman only touches the subject to make it harder on the soldier, more vague, cruder and more indeterminate. The present law upon this subject better covers the ground, and it seems to me that the gentleman can hardly have read it. By his bill he provides that whenever, in the judgment of the President, it becomes necessary, any regiments in the Army which have become depleted may be consolidated; thus, a Michigan regiment may be consolidated with one from Massachusetts, or an Iowa regiment with another from New York. There is no restriction. Whenever the President thinks proper he may bring together incongruously the remnants of any of the volunteer regiments in the Army. So far from this being an improvement in the law, the very object the gentleman professes to have in view would be thus defeated; for he would give the President the broad, unregulated, unrestrained, unlimited power to put together at his discretion any regiments in the whole Army obtained from any quarter—even those from the most remote States—if he think proper to do so. I say that I suspect the gentleman has drawn his bill without looking to see what the law now is.

I may here remark upon the whole system of the gentleman for obtaining troops. His policy, as developed by his remarks, and as vaguely indicated in his substitute, is to raise a new set of regiments in the States, beginning the provision for the war, as it were, anew, and leaving the old regiments just as they are. What is to be the consequence of that? We have now probably about four hundred brigades in the Army. Multiply that by four and you have say sixteen hundred regiments; certainly the number will not probably fall below fourteen hundred. Those regiments are to be left to be decimated and reduced to one hundred and fifty men, or fifty, or forty, or twenty-five, while we raise an Army of raw troops. That is the gentleman's expedient for meeting the demands of this great emergency, for building up the Army for future purposes, and keeping it up to its present standard. I protest against his scheme. I say that no better plan could be devised for crippling our military force, retarding the vigorous prosecution of the war, and preventing it being brought to a speedy conclusion. I repeat, that the whole theory and system of the gentleman is the getting up of a new and raw Army, beginning as it were entirely anew, commencing as we did in 1861, and as though the hard experience which we have had since that time had taught us nothing.

It is true the gentleman provides for recruiting officers, but they are to be entirely independent of the Government into whose service the troops are to be mustered when raised. He provides that when regiments are consolidated the supernumerary officers shall be sent out to recruit, but he does not even say that they shall be sent to their own States. They are to be sent off to recruit new men. Thus you will have men brought together in regiments, not from the same States, but a mixed, incongruous mass drawn from different parts of the country. What is to be done with these other men when raised? We have no positive intimation whether they are to be formed into his new regiments or are to be put into the old regiments. That feature of the bill again is entirely vague.

As to consolidation I will say this: even in consolidating companies of the same regiment, or different regiments from the same State, according to the provisions of the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the enrollment law, it has been found to work so unjustly, to be so oppressive upon officers who have borne the brunt of the war, and who are covered with scars, that in practice it has been virtually abandoned by the Government. If a specific plan of consolidation of companies in the same regiment, and of regiments from the same State, has been found not to work well, but to be oppressive on officers and men, how much more unfairly will this loose, vague, uncertain mode of consolidation provided for in the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania operate against both officers and men! So far as there is anything new in the matter, it is a discovery in use before the gentleman's bill. So far as there is anything practical in it, a more specific and a better law has been found to work badly. And now the gentleman, under the pretext of having introduced something entirely different from what has been in practice and has operated so ineffectively, would resort to consolidation, with a looseness and vagueness that would make it ten times more oppressive than anything of the kind yet tried on the part of the Government.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to give a bounty of $500. It is well that the gentlemen went into calculations to show how, like pigeons flocking to the dove-cote, everybody liable to draft would be rushing forward to pay his $300. He proposes to give $500 bounty to each of his five hundred thousand men. A very little arithmetic will show that that would amount to $250,000,000, to be paid for bounty for two years' service, which would be equal to $750,000,000 for three years. It is not to be wondered at that I should have looked at this as a bill coming most appropriately from a member of a committee which is accustomed to deal with figures representing enormous sums of money to be raised and expended, and not from any one who has taken a practical view of the working of a military bill or the military necessities of the Government.

And here let me remark in this sixth section another instance of looseness in this substitute. It is provided that these bounties shall be paid in certain proportions to the representatives of those who "shall be killed or shall die in the service" before the expiration of their terms of enlistment. Heretofore, in all similar legislation, we have thought it proper and sufficient to provide that if a man should die of wounds received or of disease contracted in the service while in the line of his duty, his widow or heirs should receive this bounty. Liberal as the Government is disposed to be, it has never gone beyond that. But this provides that if any one is killed in the service—that is to say, if he be mutinous and attempt to strike his officer and be shot down—the bounty is to be paid. If he deserts, and should die in some hovel where he is hiding himself from the officers charged with the detection of deserters, the bounty is still to be paid; because, in the contemplation of the law, a man is in service so long as his name is borne on the Army roll. Under this substitute a man who is convicted of murder or desertion and is executed by military law would be entitled to have the bounty paid to his representatives.

The gentleman has done me the credit to suppose that I know a little about law. Well, not a great deal; but I certainly know enough to comprehend that a loose, uncertain, vague provision of this kind—and it is of a character with the other provisions of this bill—can hardly be depended upon for carrying out a measure in reference to which too much care cannot be exercised to have all points made clear and precise.

The eighth section—and I only take time to go into a hurried and cursory review—which allows enrolled men to furnish substitutes, either before or after the draft, is simply a reenactment of the present law; and I am not aware of anything which now prevents white drafted men from furnishing colored substitutes. Certainly there can be nothing doubtful on that point since the equalization of the footing of the white and black soldiers. It seems to me, therefore, that the eighth section contains nothing whatever not already and fully provided.

I now come to the tenth section, and here there appears the same difficulty, on which I have already commented, in regard to those who may be killed or die in the service, without its being required to be while in the line of their duty. I may remark that there is in this tenth section the germ of a good idea, very much better developed, however, and set forth, I beg leave to suggest, in the amendment to be proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] which is printed and before us. That amendment has a like provision to this tenth section for the formation of an "Old Guard," not subject to the same objection for looseness in the manner in which it is drawn and framed.

But how is this whole plan of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to work? Suppose you call for your five hundred thousand men, and suppose not getting them you proceed with your draft. The gentleman provides that immediately after enrollment and before any draft takes place, any man who can may come forward and get off on payment of $300. Who are the men who will first come forward? It will not be the poor man, the man of slender means who will have to scratch about for a good while before he can raise his $300; but the men of abundant means, those who are flush of funds, will take advantage of the offer and pay up at once after enrollment without waiting for the draft. Everybody enrolled, except the poor or those in straitened circumstances, will therefore purchase exemption before the draft, so that when you come to find it necessary to make your draft it will be made almost exclusively from one class of persons, from those who are either so poor that they cannot raise $300 at all, or else prefer to take their chance of having to pay the $500 in future if drafted rather than $300 in advance and as a certainty. I repeat that when the draft comes the men who will then have to pay $500 or go will be the poorest class in the community, on whom the lot will fall the hardest. I defy any man to show that that is not the inevitable result of the plan which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has now brought before us.

Your man who is rich, with whom greenbacks are plenty, who is full in pocket, finding himself upon the roll, will at once rid himself of the chance of being drafted and of having to pay $500 by advancing as he can easily do his $300, while the real burden of the whole thing will rest upon those who are least able to bear it.

Now, sir, it has been objected to the substitute which I proposed, and which provides for repealing the commutation clause altogether, that it is too radical in its character; that it will create popular disturbance. The gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that it will provoke physical resistance to any attempt to enforce it. He says he hopes it will not; but that in some sections of the country there is great danger of its being resisted. Now, sir, my friend from Pennsylvania has a poorer opinion of the people than I have. I hold that the soldiers and citizens of the country have been in all these matters far ahead of the Administration and far ahead of Congress. I hold that there is nothing for which they ask, nothing they long for so much as the infusion of vigor into the Administration. Give them a law stringent in its character; a law that they see will certainly possess sufficient strength to procure men to fill up our armies to such an extent as will bring this national struggle to the speediest close; that is what the soldiers want and what the people want.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me to state upon what I founded my opinion in respect to possible resistance to such a law as he proposes, he will see that it was not upon any theoretic distrust of the people. He will recollect that during the last summer it was necessary to send several regiments of troops into the upper mining portions of Pennsylvania to enforce the draft, and hence it was that I was desirous of avoiding any such possible necessity in the future.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has a right to yield to the gentleman from Iowa for an explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. WILSON. I desire an explanation in regard to this matter. In the section of country in which I reside there are loyal people enough not in the Army to see that that law is enforced, and to see that those who are drafted obey the summons, and I hope there are loyal people enough in Pennsylvania to enforce the draft there, without calling a single man from the Army. I know it is so in the northwestern States, and I hope it is so in Pennsylvania and other States east.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not rise to say anything in reference to any other of the States. That kind of remarks do not help us at all. They are not in good taste and do not help us at all.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was saying that so far as my observation goes, if there has been dissatisfaction among the masses of loyal people of this country, that dissatisfaction arises more from a want of vigor and energy, the want of a firm, decided, and determined course, pursued in order to obtain means and men to carry on with thoroughness this war in which we are engaged, than from any supposed too rigid and active course taken by the President or by Congress. We have oftener fallen short of than gone beyond the desire and hope of the great mass of our people in this respect. Show them good results and they never quarrel with you about effective means.

Who does not remember the history of this $300 exemption clause? When that provision in relation to the payment of that amount by which exemption was to be procured first became a feature of the law it was made a political question all over the land, and there was scarcely a young Democrat in the Union who did not howl upon every stump he could mount against that oppressive, that aristocratic, that damnable clause in the enrollment act by which the poor man was to be compelled to go to war while the rich man was saved by paying his commutation. And now we have these gentlemen here, claiming to represent the Democratic sentiment of the country, voting in a body to keep it in. Why is this? Because it was thought at the time that the clause might possibly be held, or thought, or suspected by the people to bear oppressively upon them; and seizing on that idea, it was made by politicians of that class a means for opposing the carrying on of the war, and for condemning the Administration and Government. But now, when it is discovered that the people cannot be so influenced, that what the great body of loyal men really want is something efficacious, and that incumbered by this commutation the law falls short of its design, the entire programme is changed. I tell you you will find that those who are opposed to our stronger legislation, those who are allied more or less to the peace party of the country, are the men who are opposed because such legislation may be made too vigorous, because it will work, because it will get men, because it will get money, because it will furnish the means of carrying on this struggle of ours against a great, unholy rebellion which we are determined to put down.

But the loyal and best men of the country you need not be afraid of. Whenever they find that the law works vigorously; that it does get money; that it does sustain and uphold the hands of the Administration and enable it to prosecute the war, you will find them all over the land rallying to the support of the Government, and approving and defending us for infusing new force into the system of military resources. That is my judgment of the spirit of our people, and it differs widely from the croaking predictions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

How has it been in my own State? In 1862, when the people thought the Administration was pursuing rather a timid policy, when, if there was not absolute disaster everywhere to our arms there was at least doubt felt as to a vigorous and thorough conduct of military plans, we five members only on this side of the House were returned to represent districts of that State, while fourteen on the other side came here representing hostility to the war. But how was it in 1863? In that year, when our arms had been crowned generally with success, when more vigor had been infused into the national councils, when the rebellion was more firmly grappled with, and it was understood that the war was to be fought through at every cost to a glorious ending, what sort of a blaze swept over our noble State? When the great popular judgment was summed up it was shown that these colleagues of mine, these fourteen Democratic gentlemen, are but political accidents! They are not representative men. They owe their presence here to the absence of their constituents from the polls; for they came partly because the soldiers were away in the Army, as well as partly on account of the temporary discouragement and depression on the minds of the voters at home. They slipped in at the back door and took possession while the inmates and owners of the house were abroad or sleeping. But at the succeeding election, when the people were awake and in good cheer, and when our brave soldiers could take part, how different was the result! Not one of these gentlemen can rejoice in a Democratic majority. With a single exception, (and I am not even sure of that,) if the soldiers' vote be counted, not one of them, I believe, can claim to have a constituency remaining which would back their votes here against the earnest prosecution of the war and in favor of sustaining slavery. Mark thus upon the calendar the difference in two years taken from the history of a single State. It is the difference between halting doubt and active, hopeful earnestness.

Sir, I trust the people and I trust the soldiers. You have nothing to fear from them. I have spoken of the people. How is it with regard to the soldiers? Do you ever find them complain of your sending too many men to the field or that you are pursuing too vigorous a policy? You hesitate as to how somebody will regard your votes here and whether they will receive sanction at the polls at home. But go to the battle-field and stand beside some poor dying brave fellow there. Hear what he has to say. Learn, if you can, what he thinks about all this; and I tell you he will put all your doubting and hesitation to shame. If you look at the last feeble glimmering of that man's glazing eye, and speak to him about the chances of his country's cause, you will see even in his dying moment his face light up with a smile as he whispers faintly to your bending ear that his fate is as nothing if only his surviving comrades can be sustained in their endeavors to carry the loved old flag on to victory. Go to the hospitals, and what do you see there? Walk among the beds of the wounded with their shattered limbs and mangled bodies, and you will find nothing but cheerfulness, nothing but resignation; and the most you can draw from a poor fellow who is crippled in a leg or arm is that his greatest desire is to be up and at the cursed rebels again, if the Government will only furnish abundant means to go ahead effectively and prosecute the war to a complete and triumphant conclusion.

Sir, I am not afraid of the judgment of the soldiers or of the citizens. But even if I were, if I thought I might lose my nomination if I cared for it, or my election if I cared for it, it is enough for me to know that the war-making power, to which we have intrusted this whole matter, has said that we must infuse more vigor into this law by making the change which we were asked to make, and the pressing necessity for which my own judgment approves. And you, my Union friends here, you have voted down, once, twice already, a wholesome amendment by which we are to make the law give us men rather than money; but I venture to predict that you are bound to pass it yet in some form before we shall adjourn. It is enough for me to know that a change in the law is demanded for the safety of the country, and that my own information and conviction satisfy me that such a change is needed and right, to give it my support with all the power I have.

With the expression of these views, I intend to leave the subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been heard in favor of his substitute and I have spoken against it. I think he has framed his bill with about as much crudeness and hastiness as I have thrown off my remarks. I propose now to offer a substitute for his entire bill; and with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] I will accept his amendment as a part of mine, if he will withdraw it as an amendment to that which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In order that he may determine whether he will do so or not, I will send my substitute to the Clerk's desk to be read for information; and I will just remark that it is substantially the bill which has passed the Senate, embodying also the leading propositions contained in the bill which I offered and which was voted down this morning. If we adopt it in place of the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, we can then, after the previous question shall have exhausted itself, add to it any further provisions we please which may commend themselves to the favor of the House.

The Clerk read Mr. SCHENCK's substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and the acts amendatory thereof, as authorizes the discharge of any drafted person from liability to military service by reason of the payment of $300 for the procuration of a substitute or otherwise, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to alter the provisions of existing laws relative to persons actually furnishing substitutes.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in calls for drafts hereafter made under the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and the acts in addition to or amendatory thereof, the same may be made for such term of time as the President shall direct, not exceeding one year.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the number of men furnished from any district for the service of the United States beyond and above its quota on calls heretofore made, and the term of service of such men, shall be considered and allowed to said district in calls hereafter made.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no person drafted on future calls, or who shall volunteer to fill the same, shall be liable to be again drafted until the existing enrollment shall be exhausted.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, in case I withdraw my amendment, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio be not accepted, will it not be in order to offer my amendment again?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to call the previous question only on the pending amendment. One word now by way of explanation in reference to this substitute. It is the Senate bill on the Speaker's table. With becoming modesty, I regard the Senate bill as not being so good as my bill, which was voted down this morning. [Laughter.] Still, it contains two features which were the leading points of that bill. It abolishes the commutation clause and preserves that for the procuration of substitutes. Thus, it sets out with precisely the principle of the bill voted down this morning. It contains some other provisions that are not at all unacceptable, I believe, to any gentleman. Then it omits certain provisions contained in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the bill rejected this morning, in regard to enlisting men in the rebel States, in regard to providing that children shall not be mustered into the service or held, in regard to assigning men to regiments from their own States, and permitting them to select their own regiments or companies. By moving the previous question on the amendments alone, if the House conclude to adopt the Senate bill as an amendment in lieu of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, we can go on and add any of these provisions which the House may think proper to adopt. With these remarks, I move the previous question on my substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to modify my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to the gentleman's modifying it.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Ohio has been very polite and courteous in all his criticism. He has criticised my substitute in the mildest manner.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have been associated so long with my friend from Pennsylvania that I could not help it.

Mr. STEVENS. It is lawful to learn from the enemy. The criticism might have been contained in harsh language; but, mild as it was, it penetrated my sensibility and I will adopt it. I will modify my substitute in reference to the payment of bounty by making it payable in case the soldier shall die while in the service, or of disease contracted or wounds received in the service while in the line of his duty. I will also add to my substitute the fifth section of the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years, under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman's bill and mine differ radically from each other. I have a great many good things in my bill besides the radical point. I do not know why I ought to lend him matter in this way.

Mr. BLAIR. I modify my previous amendment to the original bill, and offer it as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, as provides for a commutation in money, to be paid by persons enrolled or drafted for military service, in lieu of actually rendering such military service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter no payment of money shall be accepted or received by the Government to release an enrolled or drafted man from obligation to perform military duty: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be received or accepted to serve in the Army of the United States as a substitute for any other person liable to military duty and who may have been enrolled or drafted for that purpose.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania a modification of his substitute. The seventh section of his substitute reads that it shall be lawful for any State to send out recruiting agents. I propose that he modify it so as to make it read that it shall not be lawful for any of the States to send recruiting agents, and that no State shall be credited with enlisted men who are not citizens of the State claiming the credit, or foreigners who do not owe allegiance to the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say to the gentleman that if my substitute shall be adopted it will then be open to amendment again. The previous question will only apply to the amendments.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman would adopt my amendment with his substitute at once, so that we should be sure it was there, some of us might vote for it, while we might not upon the chance that it would not be inserted afterwards.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire of course to obtain all the support I can for my substitute, and if it will satisfy the gentleman I am willing to strike that section out altogether. Do I understand that the gentleman wishes me to insert what he has read in place of the section?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I do not think I can do that, and on the whole I will allow the section to remain as it is.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. BLAIR to the original bill, 25 voted in the affirmative, and 93 in the negative.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question being next on the substitute offered by Mr. SCHENCK,

Mr. SLOAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 92, not voting 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Creswell, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Garfield, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Julian, Kelley, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the call of the roll, Mr. SCOTT stated that he had paired with Mr. PRICE.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be next upon the adoption of the substitute by Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. SMITHERS. Is it now in order to offer a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is not while the House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered:

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 120, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baily, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Eliot, English, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Hotchkiss, Kernan, Lazarus, Loan, Orin, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, William G. Steele, Stevens, Webster, and Wilder—23.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Chandler, Ambrose W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hall, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kasson, Kling, Knapp, Law, Longyear, McAllister, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Patterson, Perry, Price, Robinson, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—39.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITHERS. I now offer a substitute for the original bill.

The substitute was read; as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States may at his discretion, at any time hereafter, call for any number of men as volunteers for the respective terms of one, two, and three years for military service, and any such volunteer, or in case of draft, as hereinafter provided, any substitute, shall be credited to the town, township, precinct, or election district toward the quota of which he may have volunteered or engaged as a substitute, and every volunteer and substitute who is accepted and mustered into the service for a term of one year, unless sooner discharged, shall receive and be paid by the United States a bounty of $300, and if for a term of two years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $400, and if for a term of three years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $500, one half of which bounty shall be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into service; one fourth at the expiration of one half of his term of service, and one fourth at the expiration of his term of service, and in case of his death while in service, the residue of his bounty unpaid shall be paid to his widow, if he shall have left a widow, if not, to his children, or if there be none, to his legal representatives, and in case he is honorably discharged by reason of wounds or sickness incurred in the service he shall receive full bounty.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case the quota or any part thereof of any town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, or of any county not so subdivided, shall not be filled within the space of sixty days after such call, then the President shall order a draft for one year to fill such quota or any part thereof which may be unfilled; and in case of any such draft, no payment of money shall be accepted or received by the Government as commutation to release any enrolled or drafted man from personal obligation to perform military service.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Executive of any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, who shall be credited to the State and to the respective subdivisions thereof which may procure the enlistment.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, when mustered in, shall be organized into or attached to regiments, batteries, or other organizations of their own States, and, as far as practicable, shall, when assigned, be permitted to select their own regiments, batteries, or other organizations from among those of their respective States which at the time of assignment may not be filled to their maximum number.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years, under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for fifty per cent in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district, as provided by said section.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, instead of traveling pay, all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation from their places of residence; and persons discharged at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed transportation to their places of residence.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all persons in the naval service of the United States who have entered said service during the present rebellion, who have not been credited to the quota of any town, district, ward, or State, by reason of their being in said service and not enrolled prior to February 24, 1864, shall be enrolled and credited to the quotas of the town, ward, district, or State in which they respectively reside.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person duly drafted shall be absent from home in prosecution of his usual business, the provost marshal of the district shall cause him to be duly notified as soon as may be, and he shall not be deemed a deserter, nor liable as such, until notice has been given to him and reasonable time allowed for him to return and report to the provost marshal of his district; but such absence shall not otherwise affect his liability under this act.

Mr. SMITHERS. I have no disposition to press this substitute to a vote to-night. I desire simply to have it printed that gentlemen may at their leisure examine it. I am aware that it is impossible to understand properly an instrument merely read at the Clerk's desk. I do not design to take any advantage of the House and press this measure without allowing time for examination, and for that purpose I desire to have the amendment printed, and the vote taken to-morrow. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Then I move the previous question.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, called for the yeas and nays upon the substitute.

Mr. STEVENS called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITHERS, and Mr. MORRIS of Ohio, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-nine; a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHANNON moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 77, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orin, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—75.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kabbeisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazarus, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James K. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dumont, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hall, Kasson, Kling, Longyear, Perry, Pike, Price, Scott, Smith, Starr, Stebbins, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—30.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at eleven o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 28, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL.

On motion of Mr. WADE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COLLAMER presented seven petitions of citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the naval or military service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommended the bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy, and Charles E. Flan-dreau, reported it with an amendment.

INDIAN REGIMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 23) for the relief of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask to have that joint resolution put on its passage now. I am sure it will not lead to debate.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjudicate and settle the claims of those officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments who were commissioned by the War Department, and accepted their appointments, for such time as they or either of them were actually performing duty other than that of recruiting for the regiments. No compensation is to be allowed beyond the pay and emoluments incident to the respective rank of the several officers; nor is any claim to be considered or allowed except accompanied by the official certificates or orders of the commanding officer of the regular or volunteer officers of United States Army assigning them to such duty.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VILLAGE OF DEPOSIT.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 497) in relation to the village of Deposit, Delaware county, New York, to report it back and recommend its passage; and as it is a purely local bill to which there can be no objection, I desire to have it considered now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the village of Deposit, which is situated partly in the county of Delaware and partly in the county of Broome, in the State of New York, shall, for all the purposes of the postal laws and regulations of the United States, and the publication of the laws of the United States, and notices and other publications in pursuance of those laws, be regarded as within the county of Delaware.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS J. GALBRAITH.

On motion of Mr. WILKINSON, the joint resolution (S. No. 67) for the relief of Thomas J. Galbraith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It purposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Interior and Treasury Departments to settle and adjust the money and property accounts and claims of Thomas J. Galbraith, as agent of the United States for the Sioux Indians of Minnesota, upon principles of equity and justice; and to allow him, upon such settlement, credit for all moneys and property actually expended by him, in good faith, in and about the affairs of his agency, and for the use of the Indians, upon his affidavit or affidavits, duly sworn to, of such expenditure; and he is to be discharged from all liability for or on account of Indian trust property, which, by his affidavit or affidavits, shall clearly appear to have been destroyed or taken and carried away by hostile Indians, or by the troops or citizens of the United States, or of the State of Minnesota, against his will, and without his fault or connivance. In addition to these affidavits, the accounting officers may, in their discretion, require corroborative, countervailing, or explanatory evidence of the matters and statements set forth and sworn to in them.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that the bill (H. R. No. 494) increasing duties on imports, and for other purposes, came from the House of Representatives last night, with a request for a conference, which was agreed to by the Senate, but the committee was not appointed. I move now that the Chair be authorized to appoint that committee.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent; and the President pro tempore appointed Messrs. FESSENDEN, MORGAN, and POMEROY the committee on the part of the Senate.

COMPENSATION OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CARLILE submitted the following resolution; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That there be added to the salaries of the employees of the Senate, whose compensation does not exceed $1,200 per annum, twenty-five per cent. for the year ending the 30th of June, 1864, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

INTERCOURSE WITH DISLOYAL STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up the bill (S. No. 232) in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "delay," in line thirteen of section seven, the following:

Any officer of the United States, civil, military, or naval, or any sutler, soldier, marine, or other person, who shall violate any provision of this act, or who shall take or cause to be taken into a State declared to be in insurrection, or who shall transport or sell, or otherwise dispose of therein, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatsoever, except in pursuance of license and authority of the President, and under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided in said fifth section of the act of July 13, 1861, aforesaid, and any officer or other person aforesaid who shall make any false statement or representation upon which license and authority shall be granted for such transportation, sale, or other disposition, and any officer or other person aforesaid who shall, under any license or authority obtained, transport, sell, or otherwise dispose of any other goods, wares, or merchandise than such as are in good faith so licensed and authorized, or shall transport, sell, or dispose of the same, or any portion thereof, in violation of the terms of such license or authority, or of any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the same, shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, and fine not exceeding $5,000, and to punishment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years, before any court, civil or military, competent to try the same. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to institute such investigations as may be necessary to detect and prevent frauds and abuses in the trade and other transactions contemplated by this act or by the acts to which this is supplementary. And the agents making such investigations shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses and to make examinations on oath.

Mr. BROWN. I supposed that the Senator from Maine contemplated making some explanation in regard to this amendment and its bearings on the bill, before the vote is had. I feel disposed to facilitate the carrying into effect of the Treasury regulations and the regulations of other Departments of the Government; but I think it is a matter of very doubtful propriety whether we should make the violation of any order of the Secretary of the Treasury a penitentiary offense. I think that is carrying the matter rather further than the interest of the service demands or than will be found practicable in operation. This amendment, as I understand it, while going to the point of prohibiting any traffic or trade or transportation or sale of supplies or anything of the kind in any of the States now declared to be in insurrection, at the same time provides that for any "violation of the terms of such license or authority or of any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the same," a person "shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, and fine not exceeding $5,000, and punishment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years." I can very readily understand in the laxity of Treasury operations in my own section of the country especially how such violations might happen; how in fact it would be almost impossible to comply with every regulation and order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and how probably one half of the persons who might be engaged in trade in some way or other would find themselves liable to indictment for a penitentiary offense. I doubt very much the policy of making such an amendment.

I should be very glad to hear from the Senator from Maine in connection with this amendment; but let us proceed with some degree of caution. It is a question in which a very large proportion of the people of my State and other States adjoining are very much interested; they may become liable to these heavy fines and these penitentiary offenses; and I should be glad to know where the necessity exists for making this provision so general in its terms, so exacting and so penal in its character.

Mr. MORRILL. The amendment under consideration provides simply for the enforcement of the law, and is designed to prevent the perpetration of frauds by the officers both of the Army and of the Navy, and also by all persons connected with the service. It has been found in practice that very great frauds have been perpetrated under the licenses which have been granted under the Treasury Department, both by the agents and the officers connected with the service. Now, as the amendment applies entirely to those connected with the service, it seems to me that it is not open to the objection taken by the Senator from Missouri. You can hardly exercise over that class of persons who are thus brought into contact with this property too great a degree of scrutiny and care. I think the provision is pretty well guarded.

Mr. BROWN. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) It is.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine by striking out in line twenty-three the words "and to punishment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years."

This amendment contemplates that there shall be authority given to persons in the insurrectionary districts to sell their produce and bring in supplies for themselves and families; to do a variety of things in the way of trade, subject, of course, to the general supervision and regulation of the Treasury Department; but it goes on to provide that any person acting under any authority of the Treasury Department and bringing in supplies or taking out supplies, or anything of the kind, or purchasing for himself, who shall violate any order or any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be liable to indictment and three years' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Now I cannot conceive it possible that there is any necessity for any such penal clause, for any such regulation. It is making light and making sport of the whole penal code of the nation. It is confounding those who are guilty and those who are innocent, those who may simply violate a regulation of which they have never heard with those who may go to work systematically to defraud the Government. I would invite some little scrutiny into that clause and into its bearings. However it may strike the Senator from Maine, I can state to him that from some knowledge of the intercourse that has existed between merchants and others of my own State and adjoining States with the State of Arkansas and the State of Tennessee, a clause like this would probably place one half of those doing business in the category of being liable to a three years' term in the penitentiary.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me that something of this sort ought to prevail in this bill. It applies only to the class of persons who apply to the Government for permits and are permitted to trade.

Mr. BROWN. I understand the Senator to say that the purport of the whole bill is to put everybody that gets anything in the shape of supplies or anything else in that country under the regulation of the Treasury Department. It is in contemplation to abolish all trade and all intercourse with those districts except so far as it may be regulated and authorized by the Treasury Department for certain specific purposes, and now it is provided that under those operations those engaged in that specific purpose shall all be liable to this penalty.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not see the hardship of that. By no possibility will these provisions apply to any man who conducts himself honestly. Unless you are willing to license the wholesale fraud which has been carried on in that country, it seems to me you must attach a penalty to infidelity. This bill proposes to grant certain permission to license for limited trade. These persons are to have the privilege to carry on in that country trade upon a limited scale. Under what penalty? Under the penalty of being liable first to a fine upon conviction before any civil or military court. But any one will see that a fine in such a community, and under such circumstances, would be a very inadequate remedy against persons who should conduct themselves improperly. There is superadded to the fine, what is very common in all penal statutes, a punishment by confinement, and somewhat at the discretion of the court, not exceeding, however, three years.

Then the whole thing comes to this: under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to prevent the great frauds which have been perpetrated in the last two or three years under the authority to permit trade, it has been found necessary further to restrain the trade, to limit the power of the President somewhat to authorize trade in those districts, and, with a view of remedying the evil which everybody has seen, it is found necessary to be a little more severe in the way of penalty. What are the penalties? They are the ordinary penalties resorted to to enforce fidelity in all bills where fraud is attempted to be provided against. I really do not see, if there are to be any penalties at all, that these penalties are excessive or immoderate. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest whether that is in order. My amendment is an amendment to an amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce as the seventh section of the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Maine whether he could not by a brief sentence make a distinction between simple violations of the orders of the Treasury Department and those offenses which amount to embezzlement, misappropriation of funds in their hands, or any act of a felonious nature. Let them for felonious offenses be subject to this imprisonment and fine on conviction summarily before a court-martial; but as to mere misdemeanors in violating the Treasury orders, limit the punishment to fine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine to have proposed an amendment to the bill—

Mr. MORRILL. The Chair will perceive that the original bill was reported back by the committee with certain amendments. One of those amendments was to insert a new section as section seven. That amendment I have moved to amend, and the Senator from Missouri proposes to amend that, which would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. BROWN. Have the amendments of the committee not yet been acted on?

Mr. MORRILL. I think not. If the Senator's objection is to the words "or of any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the same," I shall not object to a modification of the amendment so as to make it apply to a violation of the license.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not strike out those words?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to striking them out, so that it would stand that a person who took a license and who should violate it should be subject to these penalties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair understands the question rightly, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is in order. The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to, and became part of the bill. The Senator from Maine proposed to amend the bill, and that amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not understand that the amendment proposed by the committee as the seventh section of the bill was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it has been agreed to. If not, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would not be in order. The Chair will refer to the record to ascertain the fact.

Mr. MORRILL. I raise no question.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senator from Maine will, at all events, amend his amendment by striking out the words "or of any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the same."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The record shows that the amendments of the committee were agreed to. The Senator from Maine now proposes to add new matter; the Senator from Missouri proposes to amend the amendment; that is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. To make it acceptable to the Senator from Missouri, I modify my amendment by striking out, in the nineteenth and twentieth lines, the words "or of any rule or regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the same."

Mr. BROWN. If the amendment were to apply only to licensed traders, and were intended to operate only in cases of fraud, I should have no objection to it; but if I understand the tenor of this amendment, and also of another amendment which the Senator proposes to offer, it is to make every person who buys his family supplies stand in the attitude of a person acting under license and authority from the Secretary of the Treasury; and if that is the case I should be sorry to affix such a penalty as this that would be indiscriminate in its application to cases of mistake and cases of error, and not simply to cases of embezzlement and of fraud.

Mr. MORRILL. By no possibility would it apply to the case supposed by the Senator from Missouri. It applies simply to officers in the service, and to those persons who connect themselves with the Government by procuring a license to trade, and wantonly violate that license.

Mr. BROWN. "Or other person."

Mr. MORRILL. "Any officer of the United States, civil, military, or naval, or any sutler, soldier, marine, or other person."

Mr. CHANDLER. This amendment is intended to meet a peculiar class of cases. The committee on the conduct of the war ascertained that from Memphis alone between twenty and thirty million dollars' worth of supplies have gone into the hands of the rebels. I drew up an amendment much more severe than this, making the penalty death. I thought that death was a light penalty for licensed officers of the Government who furnished the rebels with military supplies. But the Committee on Commerce saw fit to modify my amendment, and they have made the penalty in my judgment altogether too light. I do not think imprisonment for three years is any punishment for a man guilty of such a crime. I certainly would impose the death penalty, and take from the President in such a case the pardoning power, if that were possible. This is a light, mild proposition of the Committee on Commerce, and I trust it will not be made less by any change.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand the objection of the Senator from Missouri is not so much to a severe penalty on really guilty parties as it is to the creation of an offense in such terms that persons not really guilty may be subject to punishment, to which of course the Senator from Michigan would be as much opposed as any one. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maine a few alterations that may obviate these difficulties, and render the proposition acceptable to the Senator from Missouri perhaps. I suggest that in the seventh and eighth lines of the amendment the words "and under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury" be stricken out; and then in line fifteen, after the word "obtained," that "willfully and knowingly" be inserted; and that the words "willfully and knowingly" be inserted after "shall," in the fifteenth line.

The objection of the Senator from Missouri, as I understand, is rather that innocent persons might be involved in this punishment. Of course the Senator from Maine does not mean to impose this penalty on anybody unless he has been willfully and knowingly guilty of the offense. I presume the court would hold that to be necessary at any rate if the words were not in; but I can conceive of a case of a steamboat captain transporting goods which might be in violation of this license, without any knowledge that they were on board. It is only those persons who are seeking to violate the law, and really aid the enemy, that anybody desires to punish. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Maine, and if it be acceptable—I do not know that it will be—it will perhaps relieve the matter of difficulty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Maine that the section which he proposes to amend, being itself an amendment which has been agreed to, it may be doubtful whether, according to parliamentary rules, it is now open to amendment; but the Chair will, if there be no objection, regard the vote on it as reconsidered, and treat the proposition of the Senator from Maine as an amendment to it.

Mr. MORRILL. Looking to the objection of the Senator from Missouri, I was about to propose to insert the word "willfully" in the second line, but I have no objection to its coming in where the Senator from Illinois proposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I understand the Senator from Maine will modify his amendment by inserting the words "willfully and knowingly" after "obtained" in the fifteenth line, and the same words after "shall" in the seventeenth line.

Mr. MORRILL. I so modify my amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would make a further suggestion to the Senator from Maine, that he strike out the words "and under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury" in the seventh and eighth lines.

Mr. MORRILL. That would seem to be in harmony with the amendment already made in the nineteenth and twentieth lines.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then let those words go out if the Senator from Maine will accept my proposed modification.

Mr. MORRILL. I accept it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to insert an additional provision. I wish to insert "or shall be guilty of any act of embezzlement, of willful misappropriation of public or private money or property, or of keeping false accounts, or of willfully making any false returns, or of any other act amounting to a felony," just before the words "shall be liable to indictment," in line twenty-one. It will be remarked that in that section of the country where these persons go, there are no regular civil tribunals.

Mr. MORRILL. I accept that modification.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator from Maine the insertion of a few words in the fourth line. It reads "or who shall take or cause to be taken into a State declared to be in insurrection." I move to insert after the word "insurrection" the words "or to any other point to be thence taken into such State." I simply desire to cover the case of those who ship goods to points in Canada and elsewhere for the purpose of their being run into confederate ports.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no objection to that. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine as modified.

Mr. BROWN. I believe my amendment has not been voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment fell by the action regarding the amendment proposed as the seventh section as reconsidered.

The amendment of Mr. MORRILL as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Insert after "delay" in line thirteen of section seven:

Any officer of the United States, civil, military, or naval, or any sutler, soldier, marine, or other person, who shall violate any provision of this act, or who shall take or cause to be taken into a State declared to be in insurrection, or to any other point to be thence taken into such State, or who shall transport or sell, or otherwise dispose of therein, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatsoever, except in pursuance of license and authority of the President, as provided in said fifth section of the act of July 13, 1861, aforesaid, and any officer or other person aforesaid who shall make any false statement or representation upon which license and authority shall be granted for such transportation, sale, or other disposition, and any officer or other person aforesaid who shall, under any license or authority obtained, willfully or knowingly transport, sell, or otherwise dispose of any other goods, wares, or merchandise than such as are in good faith so licensed and authorized, or shall willfully and knowingly transport, sell, or dispose of the same, or any portion thereof, in violation of the terms of such license or authority, or shall be guilty of any act of embezzlement, of willful misappropriation of public or private money or property, or of keeping false accounts, or of willfully making any false returns, or of any other act amounting to a felony, shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, and fine not exceeding $5,000, and punishment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years, before any court, civil or military, competent to try the same. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to institute such investigations as may be necessary to detect and prevent frauds and abuses in the trade and other transactions contemplated by this act or by the acts to which this is supplementary. And the agents making such investigations shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses and to make examinations on oath.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to amend the bill by striking out at the end of section six the words "is hereby repealed," and inserting:

Except so far as may be necessary to authorize supplying the necessities of loyal persons residing in insurrectionary States, within the lines of actual occupation by the military forces of the United States, as indicated by published order of the commanding general of the department or district so occupied; and also, except so far as may be necessary to authorize persons residing within such lines to bring or send to market in the loyal States any products which they shall have produced with their own labor or the labor of freedmen or others employed and paid by them, pursuant to rules relating thereto, which may be established under proper authority. And no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be taken into a State declared in insurrection or transported therein except to and from such places and to such monthly amounts as shall have been previously agreed upon in writing by the commanding general of the department in which such places are situated and an officer designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have the Senator from Maine give us some explanation of that proposition. I have not had an opportunity to read it. I should like to know whether it leaves the designation of the different points where trade can be had, and the persons with whom it can be had, to the military commander or the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. By the act of 1861 all intercourse with States declared to be in insurrection by the proclamation of the President was illegal except that by a proviso in that act the President was authorized to grant licenses. It has been found in practice that the exception has come to be the rule and the trade is very general. The committee balanced between the idea of repealing the proviso altogether and making all trade illegal and the idea of further restricting it. The effect of this amendment is that all intercourse between the loyal States and the States or parts of States which have been declared to be in insurrection is illicit and prohibited by the statute, except that the President, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may propose for his ratification and he agree to, may allow such trade, and such only, as may be necessary to supply the necessities of persons residing in the insurrectionary States within the lines of actual occupation by our military forces. Therefore if the bill shall be passed with this amendment, the result will be that all intercourse with those States will be absolutely prohibited, except that the President may authorize a trade designed to supply the necessities of loyal persons who are actually within our lines.

Mr. GRIMES. Who is to determine whether they are loyal?

Mr. MORRILL. The President is to grant the permits, and there must necessarily, I suppose, be some discretion as to that. The persons who are to be authorized to trade are to trade with loyal persons and none other, and they are to do that under the penalties which we have just been providing; they are to act at their peril. If they trade with disloyal persons knowingly and wittingly, they will be subject to the penalty provided for by the section just adopted. The exact state of the law, as I understand, will be that all commercial intercourse as a general proposition is entirely prohibited, but this provision authorizes the President to allow loyal persons to be supplied with the necessities of life within our military lines. That, I believe, to be the extent of it.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the amendment goes a little further than to authorize a mere delivery and sale of necessities. It says that trade shall be cut off "except so far as may be necessary to authorize persons residing within such lines to bring or send to market in the loyal States any products which they shall have produced with their own labor or the labor of freedmen or others employed and paid by them, pursuant to rules relating thereto, which may be established under proper authority."

All sorts of agricultural products, cotton, sugar, molasses, all the articles in which it is said speculation has been indulged in to so great an extent, can be brought in and sold. And then the amendment goes on to provide:

And no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be taken into a State declared in insurrection or transported therein except to and from such places and to such monthly amounts as shall have been previously agreed upon in writing by the commanding general of the department in which such places are situated and an officer designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose.

They can take in anything, provided the officer who is designated by the commanding general and an agent of the Treasury Department shall so determine. As I understand it, it only adds another officer whose opinion and consent are to be obtained to the present regulations on that subject, to wit, a military officer. Now we have the agent of the Treasury Department. I do not see that we are going to gain a great deal by the adoption of the amendment.

My own impression is that either there should be an absolute, unqualified, and unconditional exclusion of trade, or else every man should be permitted to trade who chooses to do so. I do not believe in the theory of allowing trade to be carried on under the direction of anybody; but either have absolute, unqualified, unconditional exclusion, an embargo, or else give everybody an opportunity to trade as he sees fit.

Mr. CARLILE. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I wish to offer a resolution requesting the House of Representatives to return House joint resolution No. 32, which passed the Senate yesterday. It is the resolution granting additional rooms to the Agricultural Department, and I understand this morning that it takes rooms that are occupied by the Land Office and are indispensable.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution passed the House of Representatives early in the session after full debate. I object to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be received, objection being made.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been fully considered by the proper committee of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be received, objection being made.

Mr. CARLILE. I am satisfied if the Senator understands what would be the effect of the resolution he would not oppose giving me an opportunity to have the matter reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be received without unanimous consent, and is not open to debate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must call up the special order of the day, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask whether that comes up at twelve or at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At twelve o'clock, after the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope it will be laid aside.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to its being informally passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 232 will be proceeded with, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire whether the first amendment to this bill as reported by the committee—it was to strike out the first section—has been acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments have been acted on.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it will be open when the bill comes into the Senate, and the question will then be again taken.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well, then let the bill be reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator desire a separate vote on any amendment made as in committee?

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine for one moment to the amendment to the first three sections. I wish to know whether those have been struck out.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state to the Senator that they were stricken out in Committee of the Whole. I wish to state to the Senate the position of those sections. Those three sections which were stricken out on an amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce relate to the management of abandoned plantations. When the Committee on Commerce had this bill under consideration it was known that that subject had been confided to a special committee of the Senate who had reported upon the subject. It being under the consideration of another committee, the Committee on Commerce, to whom this bill had been committed, considered that it more properly belonged to that committee, and for that reason they were of opinion that they had better amend the bill in this way. But now, since it is pretty obvious from the discussions of yesterday, and the near approach of the end of the session, that no provision at all is likely to be made in that direction, I think a majority of the committee, and I do not know but all of them, would feel that if no other provision of law is to be made at this session of Congress it would be well to retain these three sections. As the matter now stands, there is no law upon the subject; the whole matter of freedmen and the supervision of abandoned plantations and property in that region of the country is conducted upon a joint order of the War and Navy Departments; and the whole business of conducting that branch of enterprise in the insurrectionary States rests entirely on the orders of the Secretary of War and regulations based thereon by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is imposing a responsibility on these Departments which they ought not to be compelled to bear; and perhaps it is a responsibility which the Senate of the United States ought not to be willing that they should assume. I think it is a justice to these Departments that there should be a statute upon which their authority should rest; and I do not think the state of things existing in the insurrectionary districts is one that the Senate of the United States can afford to put aside. It is upon us. The care of these freedmen and the care of these plantations and this property are really upon the Government of the country to a greater or less extent; and being so, it seems to me that it ought to rest upon a statute of the United States, and not upon the orders of any Department. These provisions are very general in their character. These three sections follow in effect the orders of the War and Navy Departments and the regulations of the Treasury which exist at the present time, leaving the care and management just where the War, Navy, and Treasury Departments together have chosen to put it. I therefore suggest that the Senate non-concur in this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire a separate vote on that amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. I desire a separate vote on the amendment striking out the first three sections of the bill, and also on the amendment striking out the eighth section.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want a separate vote on the amendment opening up trade in specified cases.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the amendment to the sixth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except those which have been reserved for a separate vote.

The amendments were concurred in.

The first excepted amendment was to strike out the first three sections of the bill, as follows:

That sales of captured and abandoned property under the act approved March 12, 1863, may be made at such places in States declared in insurrection as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as at other places now authorized by said act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the captured and abandoned property to be received, collected, and disposed of, as provided in said act, the said agents shall take charge of and lease for periods not exceeding twelve months the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the districts therein named, and shall also provide, in such leases or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free. Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all moneys arising from the leasing of abandoned lands, houses, and tenements, or from sales of captured and abandoned property collected and sold in pursuance of said act or of this act, or from fees collected under the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by the President, dated respectively the 25th day of August, 1862, the 31st day of March and the 11th day of September, 1863, or under any amendments or modifications thereof, which have been or shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President, for conducting the commercial intercourse which has been, or shall be, licensed and permitted by the President, with and in States declared in insurrection, shall, after satisfying therefrom all proper and necessary expenses to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and all accounts of moneys received or expended in connection therewith shall be audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was not concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the eighth section, in the following words:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of States declared in insurrection, at such places therein as shall be designated by him, at such prices as shall be agreed on with the seller, not exceeding the market value thereof at the place of delivery, nor exceeding three fourths of the market value thereof in the city of New York at the latest quotations known to the agent purchasing: Provided, That no part of the purchase money for any products so purchased shall be paid, or agreed to be paid, out of any other fund than that arising from property sold as captured or abandoned, or purchased and sold under the provisions of this act. All property so purchased shall be forwarded for sale at such place or places as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the moneys arising therefrom, after payment of the purchase money and the other expenses connected therewith, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the accounts of all moneys so received and paid shall be rendered to and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was not concurred in.

The next excepted amendment was at the close of section six to strike out the words "is hereby repealed" and insert:

Except so far as may be necessary to authorize supplying the necessities of loyal persons residing in insurrectionary States within the lines of actual occupation by the military forces of the United States, as indicated by published order of the commanding general of the department or district so occupied; and also, except so far as may be necessary to authorize persons residing within such lines to bring or send to market in the loyal States any products which they shall have produced with their own labor or the labor of freedmen or others employed and paid by them, pursuant to rules relating thereto, which may be established under proper authority. And no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be taken into a State declared in insurrection or transported therein except to and from such places and to such monthly amounts as shall have been previously agreed upon in writing by the commanding general of the department in which such places are situated and an officer designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator from Maine if the eighth section is now retained in the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It is.

Mr. BROWN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Ten Eyck—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Harding, Hendricks, Johnson, Richardson, and Wright—8.

So the bill was passed.

ARMY NEWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the War Department:

WASHINGTON, June 28.

A dispatch from General Grant, dated yesterday, the 27th, at 3.30 p. m., at his headquarters, reports no operations in front, except from our own guns, which fire into the bridge at Petersburg from a distance of two thousand yards.

The dispatch gives the following intelligence from the rebel papers:

A Petersburg paper of the 25th states that Hunter is striking for Jackson river depot, about forty miles north of Salem, and says that if he reaches Covington, which they suppose he will, with most of his forces, but with loss of material, he will be safe.

The same paper accuses Hunter of destroying a great amount of private property, and stealing a large number of wagons, horses, and cattle.

The same paper also states that Wilson destroyed a train of cars, loaded with cotton and furniture, burned the depot building, &c., at Burkesville, and destroyed some of the track, and was still pushing south.

All the railroads leading into Richmond are now destroyed, and some of them badly.

A dispatch from General Sherman, received this morning, reports that yesterday, June 27, an unsuccessful attack was made by our forces on the enemy's position, which resulted in the loss of between two and three thousand. The following particulars are given:

"Pursuant to my order of the 24th, a diversion was made on each flank of the enemy, especially down the Sandtown road. About 8 a. m. McPherson attacked at the southwest end of the Kennesaw, and Thomas at a point about a mile further south. At the same time the skirmishers and artillery along the whole line kept up a sharp fire. Neither attack succeeded, though both columns reached the enemy's works, which are very strong.

"McPherson reports his loss about five hundred, and Thomas about two thousand. The loss is particularly heavy in general and field officers, among them General Harker; also Colonel Dan. McCook, commanding a brigade; Colonel Rice, of the fifty-seventh Ohio, very seriously. Colonels Barnhall, fortieth Illinois, and Augustine, of the fifty-fifth Illinois, are killed. General Harker is reported mortally wounded.

"McPherson took a hundred prisoners, and Thomas about as many, but I do not suppose we inflicted a heavy loss on the enemy, as he kept close behind his parapets."

No other military intelligence has been received by the Department.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. DANIEL CLARK,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate as the special order.

Mr. POWELL. I move that that and all other orders be postponed so as to take up the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent military and naval officers and other persons in the service of the United States from interfering in elections in the States.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state to the Senate that if the motion to reconsider shall be voted down, it should be done speedily, so that the bill may be sent to the House of Representatives in time to be acted on there during the present session. There will be no debate on the question; it will merely occupy the time required to take the vote. I understand that the Senator from Michigan does not desire to discuss it further; I do not; let us take it up and vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can we not by unanimous consent take the vote on the reconsideration by yeas and nays in the place of this vote?

Mr. POWELL. That is all I wish.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois suggests that, by unanimous consent, the vote be taken by yeas and nays on the reconsideration now. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The question is, will the Senate reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 37 was passed?

Mr. HOWARD. I shall not detain the Senate a moment on this bill further than to state the posture of the question. The Senate a few days ago, in the absence of eleven Senators, who, I presume, would have voted against this bill if they had been present, passed the bill that had been introduced at an early period of the session by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the object of which bill was to prevent, in his phrase, the interference of the military authorities with elections. The bill underwent considerable amendment before it was put upon its final passage, by which amendments many of the obnoxious clauses contained in the original bill were expunged. Nevertheless, if this bill is passed, it will stand as a censure of the Senate upon the military authorities against whom these charges have been launched by the Senator from Kentucky and his friends in this Chamber, a severe and lasting censure, for which I will never vote. That is all I have to say. I hope the motion to reconsider will be carried in order that the bill may then be laid on the table.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose to discuss the question; but the passage of this bill will not be any censure upon the military authorities more than any penal law we have passed during this session is a censure on some civil officer who may have committed frauds on the Government. I hope the bill will not be reconsidered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, Sautsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Fessenden, Harding, Howe, Johnson, Richardson, and Wright—7.

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote passing the bill.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 54) to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first amendment of the House.

That the Senate agree to the second amendment of the House, amended so as to read as follows: in section one, strike out all after the word "west" where it last occurs in line twenty-five down to and including the word "west" in line twenty-nine, and the House agree to the same as amended.

That the Senate agree to the third and fourth amendments of the House.

That the House recede from its fifth, sixth, and seventh amendments.

That the Senate agree to the eighth amendment of the House with the following amendment, to wit: strike out all after the words "provided further that," and in lieu thereof insert "no person shall be allowed to subscribe for more than $15,000;" and the House agree to the same as amended.

That the Senate agree to the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth amendments of the House.

That the Senate and House agree to an amendment striking out the words "ninety working days" in section seventeen, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "four months."

L. M. MORRILL,

B. F. WADE,

W. T. WILLEY,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

EZRA WHEELER,

J. W. PATTERSON,

J. G. BLAINE,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

VISITATION OF FORTS, ETC.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and take up the joint resolution (S. No. 73) to allow Senators and Representatives to visit forts, military prisons, and hospitals within their respective States.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. RIDDLE. I think it will lead to no debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it cannot pass without debate; and I hope the Senate will proceed with the order of the day.

Mr. McDOUGALL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, and Sautsbury—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Harding, Howard, Johnson, Richardson, and Wright—8.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CARLILE. I now offer a resolution requesting the House of Representatives to return to us the joint resolution granting additional rooms to the Agricultural Department, in order that I may make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed. I am sure the Senator from Ohio will not object to my submitting the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia desires unanimous consent to submit a resolution at the present time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall object undoubtedly and resist the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be received. The bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that the object of the Senator from Virginia is to enter a motion which is regarded as privileged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is not debatable.

Mr. HARLAN. But it is in order to state what is proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Virginia desires to move a reconsideration of a vote that was taken yesterday.

Mr. CARLILE. I understand that I have a right to make the motion to reconsider as a question of privilege. It does not require unanimous consent to do it.

Mr. SUMNER. I take it the Senator has a right only to enter the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The joint resolution is not here, but has gone to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is not in order, the joint resolution not being in possession of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (H. R. No. 117) to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses incurred in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion, which I reported a few days ago from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be taken up to interfere with the order of the day. Let us proceed to vote on that, and then we can take up the Senator's bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania; it was examined by the Committee on Finance; it ought to be passed; but I think we had better proceed in order. I shall vote against taking it up now out of its order.

Mr. COWAN. I am very much oppressed in regard to this bill; it is considered important in our State; I have yielded and kept it back for a long time, and I trust I shall now be able to have it taken up and passed. It will not occupy much time.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator makes a mistake in antagonizing it with another bill which has been discussed several days and which seems to be approaching a close.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not press it now.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his motion; we are for his bill.

Mr. COWAN. Well, I withdraw the motion now.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 540) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes; and that it had passed a bill (No. 558) to authorize the issuing of patents for certain lands in the town of Stockbridge, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 121) for the relief of Lieutenant William P. Richner, seventy-seventh regiment Ohio volunteer infantry;

A bill (S. No. 190) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a commission to select a site for a navy-yard and naval station on the western waters, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents;

A bill (S. No. 335) to carry into effect the convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to release certain parties from liabilities or payment of duties and penalties therein mentioned;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a "joint resolution explanatory of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,'" approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, and Willey—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Harding, Howard, Johnson, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment to be added as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, and other employés of the United States, or any one of them, under the provisions of this act, shall not be interested either directly or indirectly in the proceeds of any property occupied, possessed, or cultivated under the provisions of this act, other than as the agent or agents of the United States; and should any such person appropriate to his own use any such property, or the proceeds of the sale or rent of any such property, or any property or means derived from the cultivation thereof, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment for a period not longer than ten years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall be forever disqualified from holding office under the Government of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand that that section provides before what court he is to be tried. I have prepared an amendment bearing very much on the same subject, and I will read it; perhaps there may be in some portions of the section I have drawn a more definite statement of how he is to be tried.

Mr. SUMNER. The words "before any court of competent jurisdiction" might be added.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In all those States where we are going to send these officers, or in several of them, at all events, there are no civil tribunals; there is nothing there but the tribunals which are established by the war power. I will read the section which I had drawn:

And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as the supervising special agents appointed within the States within which the insurrection exists and the authority of the civil tribunals is overthrown, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents; and for all offenses amounting to a felony, for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property, for any willful act of oppression of any freeman or of any loyal inhabitant, for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value for any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or in carrying on any business, or in being in any manner, directly or indirectly, interested in any business carried on under the supervision of the officers appointed under this act, or for any other willful and gross violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

This provides for the trial of these officers, where the civil tribunals are overthrown, by courts-martial. If you do not provide for this by courts-martial they are subject to no trial, and these men would go there really irresponsible, with such immense powers in their hands that I fear the temptations would be too strong for human nature, and they would be almost like an army of robbers, oppressing the freedmen and trampling on the loyal people at the same time; and therefore I agree entirely in the spirit of the amendment offered by my friend from Iowa. I have drawn this up with a view to make them triable by courts-martial in those places where the civil authorities are overthrown.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin to make a slight modification so as to say "court-martial, or military commission."

Military commissions generally try such cases.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. To that I have no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to some portion of the language in the latter part of his amendment. It says, "any willful or gross violation." The term "or gross" cannot be defined legally very easily, I apprehend, and a tribunal would have to determine whether an act was a gross act; otherwise there could be no punishment. It is enough to say "for any willful violation of duty."

Mr. SUMNER. I was about to make the same suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin. Then I would suggest to my friend from Iowa to accept the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin as a substitute for his. They are both in the same sense; they have the same idea; they look the same way; only the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is more elaborate and careful.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the suggestion of gentlemen to let the language stand simply "willful violation of their official duties."

Mr. HARLAN. I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if the phraseology that he has proposed is applicable to any other country than that where the civil tribunals have been overthrown.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose it would not be. It would not make them triable by court-martial anywhere else.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to me it ought to embrace all parties appointed under the authority of this act, whether in places where the civil authority is restored or not. It may be desirable to restore civil authority for the very purpose of trying them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It might be well to have an additional clause or section stating that where the civil authorities are not overthrown they shall there be liable to be tried on indictment, and on conviction punished.

Mr. HARLAN. At the suggestion of the chairman of the committee who has this bill in charge, I withdraw my proposed amendment to enable the Senator from Wisconsin to offer his.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer mine.

Mr. HARLAN. Let it be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as the supervising special agents appointed within the States within which the insurrection exists, and the authority of the civil tribunals is overthrown, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents; and for all offenses amounting to a felony, for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property, for any willful act of oppression of any freeman or of any loyal inhabitant, for any act of taking or receiving directly or indirectly any money or thing of value for any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or in carrying on any business, or in being in any manner directly or indirectly in any business carried on under the superintendence of the officers appointed under this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I sympathize with the general purpose of this amendment; I think there should be some guard like it in the bill, but I cannot vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, for I do not think a vote of Congress makes a man a part of the military or naval service of the United States when in fact he is not. A man is appointed under this law to go down South and take charge of some of the property of the Government; he is not in the Army, and we cannot put him there by our vote. It is suggested to me by a Senator for whose opinion I have great respect, that by a declaration of Congress he may be regarded as a part of the military service with a view to punishment; but the Constitution provides that a man guilty of a crime shall be tried by a jury, unless for offenses committed in the military and naval service of the United States. Now, it is a question of fact, will these officers of necessity be a part of the military or naval service?

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose we put them under the Secretary of War instead of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is in fact placed under the charge of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILSON. That is the frame of the bill now; but I intend to offer an amendment to put this bureau under the War Department.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I intended to allude to that as a matter of illustration, but it really does not affect my judgment about the question. Whether these officers shall respond to the War Department or to the Treasury Department does not really change the character of their office and the nature of the duties imposed on them by the law. Are they military officers? Do they discharge military duty?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that this whole bill is a kind of war measure, a war necessity. If peace existed in these States, if there were no insurrection in these States, no one pretends or could pretend that we could exercise any such power, either over the people of these States or over the property within these States. It is of necessity temporary in its character. When peace comes and the States are restored, the States will assume jurisdiction over their own people and over their own property as a matter of course. But this is a temporary measure growing out of the war necessities, and the Senator will see that I have carefully confined the trial by courts-martial to those very districts where the war exists, where the civil tribunals are overthrown, and where there is an absolute necessity, if we do not want to have these men go without any responsibility, to be like a band of robbers almost, to prey both upon the freedmen who are put under their superintendence and upon the loyal people of that country, that we should establish a tribunal which shall hold them responsible; and they are engaged in the military service to that extent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think, indeed, the evils that the Senator so forcibly describes ought to be prevented; and it is because of those evils that I am going to vote against this bill, among other reasons. But to avoid one evil I am not willing to run against the provisions of the Constitution as I understand it. I think these officers are likely to go down into that country and become a set of public plunderers; I believe that is probably to be the result; and I have never seen a law framed under which there could be such outrages and plundering, in my judgment, as this bill will produce in the region of country in which it is to be put in operation. Although I desire to see accomplished what the Senator from Wisconsin desires, and to check and prevent this evil as far as possible, still I am not willing by a law to say that a man is part of the Army or part of the Navy, when in fact he is not. These men are not in the Army; they are not responsible to military authority; no military officer can command them. The duties they discharge are not of a military character. The duties they discharge are in relation to a particular class of people not in the Army, and in relation to the property of the Government. This certainly does not constitute them officers or privates in the Army, or in any way connected with the Army. The fact that it is temporary makes no difference. The question is, are they military officers, are they connected with the Army, are they in the military or naval service? If not, how can you punish them by court-martial?

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator from Indiana is certainly mistaken. In 1866, when Congress enacted the Articles of War, in Mr. Jefferson's Administration, they provided by the fifty-sixth and fifty-seventh articles for trying by court-martial and punishment any person in the United States for doing certain things. The Senator and myself are liable to be tried by court-martial if we do certain things, and that under the laws of the country made nearly sixty years ago. By the fifty-sixth Article of War it is provided:

"Whosoever shall relieve the enemy with money, victuals, or ammunition, or shall knowingly harbor or protect an enemy, shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of a court-martial."

The language includes every man, woman, and child in the United States who does that act. The fifty-seventh Article of War is:

"Whosoever shall be convicted of holding correspondence with or giving intelligence to the enemy, either directly or indirectly, shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of a court-martial."

The Thirty-Seventh Congress provided that spies who before were tried by court-martial should be tried by military commission, and that the sentence might be executed by a general in the field without going to the President for approval. A general in the field may take up any person he chooses to consider as a spy, try him before a military commission, prove him to be a spy, and execute him without appealing to the President. By a law of the same Congress every contractor in the Army and Navy of the United States is considered for the purposes of punishment as in the military or naval service, and may be tried and punished by court-martial; and there is no power in the country to revise it or correct it. We are trying and executing men nearly every day under these laws. The man who rode up to the ambulance in which General McCook was lying very sick and murdered him, has been tried and convicted and condemned to suffer death, although he afterwards joined the rebel service, but has since been taken prisoner. We are trying guerrillas and punishing them. In fact in the rebel country in our possession there is nothing else but military law administered by courts-martial and military commissions. They are trying people everywhere there and punishing them in all forms except death, imprisoning them, fining them, and there is no court in this country that can set aside their action.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me to call his attention to the precise words of one of the statutes to which my colleague has referred he will see, I think, that there is a precedent for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. I refer to the act of Congress approved July 17, 1862, the sixteenth section, relating to the punishment of contractors:

"That whenever any contractor for subsistence, clothing, arms, ammunition, munitions of war, and for every description of supplies for the Army or Navy of the United States, shall be found guilty by a court-martial of fraud or wilful neglect of duty, he shall be punished by fine, imprisonment, or such other punishment as the court-martial shall adjudge."

Mr. HENDRICKS. When I rose before I intended merely to suggest the objection which I knew would be appreciated at once whether there was force in it or not, and now I desire to say just one word in addition. I do not think the Articles of War to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] has called the attention of the Senate furnish a precedent in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. Those articles provide for cases where men actually engage in war and become a party to the war, not in the Army of the United States directly, but being traitors furnish by overt acts aid to the enemy. The other statute of 1862 which declares contractors a part of the Army and the Navy as they may be furnishing supplies I had occasion to examine in a trial before a military commission last fall, and I then had some doubt about the constitutionality of that provision. But there is a reason why a contractor may be regarded as part of the Army or Navy that would not apply to these officers, and that is that by their own act, after the passage of the law, they go on to furnish the Army with its supplies, and they agree to be a part of the Army by accepting a contract after that time, and going on to furnish the Army itself.

Mr. GRIMES. Do not these men?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, but the duties are different. The one furnishes the Army; he is to some extent a quartermaster. Suppose a quartermaster went out and in market overt purchased supplies for the Army, he is a part of the Army. A person without being actually appointed does the same duties. His duties are military in their character.

Mr. GRIMES. The quartermaster was a non-combatant, and he was not made amenable to military law until the act of 1812.

Mr. BUCKALEW. He is as much a combatant as a drummer.

Mr. GRIMES. He is a non-combatant and not regarded as a combatant in the Army, and was not made amenable to military law until 1812. Neither quartermasters nor commissaries were, and then were made so only by special act of Congress. But when a man accepted his commission under a law which made him amenable to the military law there was a perfect understanding, and there was no injustice done to him and no injustice to the Government. I do not see any distinction between a quartermaster who is to act under the direction of the Secretary of War and these commissioners who are to act under the Secretary of War, if we change this bill from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of War.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Iowa two cases. Under the act of 1862 a contractor agrees to furnish to the Army suitable supplies and provisions. Instead of doing so he furnishes horses that are not fit for the service, or supplies that are not fit for the men. Here is a violation of his contract, and not only a violation of his contract but a violation of his duty as defined by the law. He is furnishing the Army, directly in the public service, in direct connection with the Army. He is tried under a military commission for that offense, because in his direct and immediate connection with the Army he has not done his duty. But suppose that under this act one of these officers in the southern States takes possession of a piece of land that belongs to the Government and he has it cultivated and receives from the proceeds of that land $1,000, it is his duty to account for that money to the Treasury. He fails to do so. It is the receipt of money from Government property which he ought to pay into the Treasury and he fails to do it, and you propose for that which is in no sense military to try him in a military court. It seems to me there is a very broad distinction in the two cases.

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose on the other hand that this commissioner or this agent who is acting under the authority of the Secretary of War is directed to work a thousand hands to accomplish a specific purpose in aid of the Army by the direction of the Secretary of War, who is the chief both of the agent, of the commissioner, and of the Army; he fails to obey that military order that he received from his superior, the commander-in-chief: ought he not to be amenable to military law?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think not, unless he is connected with the Army, or his duties are of a military character.

Mr. GRIMES. We choose to connect him with the Army, and he accepts his commission as an attaché of the Army. We connect him with the Army if we see fit to change this bill to that effect. We connect him with the Army because we authorize him, under one of the provisions of this bill, to call the Army to his assistance whenever it may be necessary, because we believe that the Army may under some circumstances be necessary to protect these officers and the men under them, and because we believe that under some circumstances these commissioners and the men who are laboring under them may be of advantage to the Army. Such a thing may occur as to require all of the men who may be working upon these estates to be taken into the public service and used as soldiers for the time being. Now, should not the commission who has the general superintendence of these workmen whom under some circumstances it may be necessary to convert into soldiers, be held responsible to the War Department for the fulfillment of the order of the War Department to that effect? It seems to me he should. There cannot be any injustice about it. The men take their offices with the distinct understanding that they are to be responsible to the Rules and Articles of War. Where is the wrong, where is the hardship?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not want the Senator to think I put it upon the ground of hardship. I do not put it on that ground. It is entirely a constitutional ground that troubles me.

Mr. DAVIS. The Constitution establishes this distinct, broad, deeply founded principle: that a civilian under no state of case is to be put on trial for any offense by a court-martial and by martial law. I am opposed to this amendment because it violates, in my judgment, that great and essential principle of liberty. I approve heartily of the spirit in which this amendment has been drawn up by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. It is a laudable and proper purpose, I have no doubt, that has prompted him with so much care and particularity to prepare this amendment. My only regret is that I have not the power according to my judgment to vote for it. If I had I would vote for it with alacrity and with a great deal of pleasure. I have no doubt that that system of thieving and plundering and robbing which he expects the men that will be engaged in the execution of this freedmen's bill will indulge in in the South will be more than realized; and I only regret that summary, condign, and perfectly legal and legitimate punishment cannot be brought to bear on them at once to make them signal examples of the iniquity of their acts and of their crimes. But in my disposition to have such infamous characters brought to punishment I never will consent to vote for a measure that in my opinion would infract the Constitution, as I believe this would.

The Constitution provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces." For any man to be subjected to a military court, to trial by martial law, and to military punishment, and to be abstracted from trial and sentence and punishment under the civil courts, he must belong to the military or naval forces, or he must be of the militia of a State in the actual service of the United States. The question is simply this, in relation to every man or class of men who would be embraced by this or any similar provision, is he a part of the military or naval forces of the United States, or is he a part of the militia of any State in the service of the United States? If you answer this question in the affirmative you make him subject to military tribunals. If you answer it in the negative, you cannot subject him to such courts and such trial by martial law without a flagrant and most mischievous infraction of the Constitution.

Now, sir, there are two codes that bear upon this subject under our form of government. The first is the Constitution and the civil laws passed under its authority; the other is the law of nations applicable to military affairs and military courts so far as they are adopted by our Constitution. So far as this branch of national law infringes or is in conflict with our Constitution it falls and has no effect whatever. But there are certain classes of men that may be punished by courts-martial under the military law of nations, spies for instance, or persons giving information to the enemy; they may be punished by courts-martial, because the branch of national law regulating military affairs authorizes all such descriptions of persons to be punished by courts-martial. But, sir, all the persons who are excluded by the provisions of the Constitution which I have read from trial by courts-martial and by military law, cannot by any legislation of Congress be subjected to such tribunals and to such law. You must clearly, indisputably bring every man that you subject to trial before a military court within the description of persons that belong to the military or naval forces or the militia of a State in the service of the United States before you can make him amenable in the least degree to military law and military courts.

For these reasons, although I applaud the object and the spirit of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin in presenting this amendment, and although I would feel so entirely willing to give him all the aid which my opinion of the latitude that would be allowed by the Constitution would authorize me to give, I feel myself imperatively restrained from voting for this amendment by this direct provision of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLEY. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin whether in some other section of the bill a provision cannot be inserted making this Commissioner and his subordinates in point of fact a part of the military service of the country. There seems to me to be very great force in the opinion which the honorable Senator from Kentucky has urged, as well as the honorable Senator from Indiana; but in point of fact it seems to me that the service is so related to that of the military branch that by some provision of the bill recognizing them as part of the military service the objections which have been urged against the amendment might be obviated. It is very certain that this amendment in some form or other ought to be adopted. It will take away one of the fundamental objections which I mentioned to the bill at first, and impose some restraints on the most stupendous system of fraud that ever was devised.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has announced his purpose to move to have this whole matter under the War Department, while the Senator from Massachusetts having charge of the bill [Mr. SUMNER] is desirous that it should remain under the control of the Treasury Department. That is a question upon which the minds of Senators may be divided, and I do not know what the sense of the Senate may be when it comes to a vote. But independent of the decision of that question, it seems to me that whether it is to be left to the Treasury Department or put into the War Department, when we come to look at it as it is, these officers may just as well be declared in the military service of the country, so far as this matter is concerned, though the Treasury Department is the Department to which they make their returns, as if they were in the War Department. The truth is, the theory of our Administration is that the Executive is a unit. All is done under the President as the Commander-in-Chief. The various Secretaries are but the clerks of the President, doing his business; and whether the Executive speaks through the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War, it is the President of the United States, the Executive, the Commander-in-Chief, who executes the laws, and therefore, whether the Senate shall determine that this shall remain under the Treasury Department or go to the War Department, it seems to me there is no valid foundation in the objection to the amendment that I have offered, which provides that in those districts where our power is military, where the civil authority is overthrown, the officers whom we appoint may be regarded as acting under military authority to the extent that we can bring them to punishment by military law, for we have no other authority to punish them for their offenses there. That is my reply to the honorable Senator from West Virginia.

When the question comes up as to which Department shall have the control of this matter, I may, perhaps, vote with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] upon the idea that it is more harmonious to have the whole thing in the military districts controlled by one head rather than by two, although the theory of our Government is that it is all controlled by one head, and that is the President of the United States, though nominally you may say the Secretary of the Treasury issues an order in the one case and the Secretary of War in the other.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move an amendment which is little more than verbal, to bring the bill into harmony with an amendment already made. In section seven, lines ten and eleven, I move to strike out "provided that no lease shall be made by them for a longer period than one year," and then in the eleventh line to strike out the word "that."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I propose to offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the said Commissioner cannot find abandoned real estate on which to employ all of the freedmen who may come under his care and control by virtue of this act, it shall be his duty, so far as may be practical, to provide for them homes and employment with humane and suitable persons at fair and just compensation for their services; and that in order the more effectually to accomplish this purpose the said Commissioner shall open a correspondence with the Governors and the various municipal authorities of the different States requesting their cooperation in this behalf.

It is very obvious that at this time there are very few plantations, however many of them may be abandoned, on which it would be safe or profitable to place these freedmen and to employ them. There is no district in the country coming within the scope of this bill where taking possession of the real estate now abandoned and placing upon that real estate any given number of these freedmen, it would not be necessary also to employ more or less of the military forces to protect them while they were cultivating the farms. Take Virginia for illustration. About half the State is now within our lines, I mean on this side of our main army; and yet there is not a farm anywhere where it would be safe to place any of these freedmen, where they would be allowed to work a month, much less a year so as to raise a crop, without strong military protection. Mosby's guerrillas would hunt the hands off any farm almost anywhere in our lines within Virginia. I imagine the same state of things exists elsewhere. It is obvious, and the fact has indicated the necessity of this bill, that there is a large number of freedmen now unemployed, and scores and hundreds and thousands of them are dying for the want of care and employment within our lines and under our control. I suggest to the friends of this bill, I respectfully suggest to the friends of freedmen, whether it be not perhaps the best provision, if it can be incorporated in this bill, to extend the Commissioner's authority so that he can do some practical good at the present time and hereafter by opening a correspondence with the Governors of States, the municipal authorities of the States, with the various manufacturing establishments, and farmers and mechanics. Homes might be provided for them, and they might not only find good homes, but humane persons and employment at fair compensation, and it might supply in those districts that lack of labor which has been occasioned by the withdrawal of laboring men into the ranks of our armies.

It seems to me this would be a beneficial feature to incorporate in this bill. I begin to take some interest in the bill. It is very little now like what it was when first introduced. Restrictions are being thrown around it to prevent many of the evils that would necessarily have grown out of the operation of the bill. I take it for granted that it will pass, and if so, I should like to see it made as operative for good as possible. It seems to me that here is a proposition which will accomplish more good for the freedmen, find them more homes and better compensation and with a great deal less trouble and expense, than the whole machinery when it is in its fullest operation will ever find for them upon the abandoned plantations of the South.

Mr. SUMNER. It is with great reluctance that I object to the proposition of the Senator, but he will allow me to say that it seems to me it goes too far. There is also language in it which I should regret to see in the bill. He speaks of the freedmen "under the care and control of the Commissioner." In drawing the bill, I am sure the committee had no idea that any freedman would be under the control of the Commissioner. I know that has been suggested.

Mr. WILLEY. I am willing the Senator shall choose any other language. I noticed in the original bill they were called "held to service," but I believe that has been stricken out. If the honorable Senator will suggest any other language to accomplish the purpose, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have examined carefully the proposition of the Senator, and I beg him to understand that the idea which he seems to aim at is entirely in harmony with the bill, only, as I said before, by his language it seems to me he goes too far. I have just made a sketch in the nature of a substitute for his proposition which I will read to him if he will have the kindness to listen to it:

That whenever there is no plantation real estate on which to employ the freedmen, it shall be the duty of such assistant commissioners and superintendents, so far as may be practicable, to aid such freedmen in obtaining homes and employment with humane and suitable persons at fair and just compensation for their services.

I believe that is substantially the idea. It differs from the proposition of the Senator in that it says nothing about "control," and then it does not go as far in this respect: his proposition says that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner, so far as may be practicable, to provide for them homes and employment. It would seem to follow from that language that he must assume an obligation to find homes for them, and that possibly might throw upon the Government some pecuniary responsibility. I believe that the idea of the Senator will be carried out fully, by my substitute, but as for opening communications with the Governors and other officers, it strikes me that all that more properly comes under the head of "rules and regulations," which it is understood are to be prepared by the Department in which this bureau is organized.

Mr. WILLEY. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment of the language if he will incorporate with it the provision soliciting the cooperation of the various authorities in the different States. I think it will amount to very little unless that is done. There must be some agency with whom this Commissioner or the assistant commissioners can cooperate in various quarters where labor is required, in order to enable them to accomplish anything. How can these assistant commissioners in the insurrectionary districts, where they ought to be—whether they ever will be employed there personally or not is very questionable to me—how can they while employed there, engaged in superintending, taking care of, or whatever language the honorable Senator may indicate to designate their management of these freedmen—how can they, while in the discharge of that duty, make any efficient arrangement in providing homes or aiding the freedmen in procuring homes in those districts where labor is so much needed? The operation would be very much facilitated, it seems to me, by securing the cooperation of the authorities of the loyal States, especially those States where labor is so much needed, in order to procure for the freedmen employment and homes there where they will have the benefit of laws, and not be subject to raids as they will be on these farms; where they will have the benefit of free institutions, the benefit of kind and humane society, the benefit of the benevolence that would surround them, in aiding them to elevate themselves to independence and real freedom. It seems to me that there would be nothing so conducive to carry into effect one of the objects which the honorable Senator seems to have in view, and in which I heartily sympathize, that is, in elevating these freedmen, as to place them in the midst of the free States, where they would not be under the necessity of submitting their rights to the arbitrary will and pleasure of these superintendents and assistant commissioners, but where they would be equal before the law, subject to the same law, and having the same rights to redress of grievances that any other citizen in the community would have. It seems to me that the provision that the honorable Senator suggests does not accomplish the object fully; but if he will modify it so as to make it efficient in diffusing this population wherever labor is wanted in the midst of organized free communities, I will accept it, for that is one of the main objects I had in view.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This amendment contemplates the distribution of this population throughout the whole country and in our northern States, by the action of the Federal Government. Sir, I think our States in the North may well object to any such exertion of power or rather perversion of power by this Government.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator misunderstands entirely. It is only to be done "so far as practicable" and where persons living in the northern States or elsewhere may desire this labor, desire to employ these laborers. There is no compulsion about it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certain of the northern States prohibit the introduction of this element of population within their borders, and I think they have a perfect right to establish and maintain their own policy on that subject. Now, you propose to take into the hands of the Federal Government the business of distributing this population among the States, and according to your policy and not according to theirs. I think the proposition, upon the mere statement of it, is so monstrous and in its effects so pernicious that it ought to receive no favor or indulgence from this body. At all events, for one I shall vote against it. I conceive that public policy, the best policy that can be adopted by our States in the North requires that, instead of encouraging the migration of this population, they shall discourage its introduction altogether. If you organize a system of this kind by Federal power, if you establish a bureau for the purpose of diffusing this population, under the pressure of existing exigencies, on account of the lack of labor in our communities, perhaps a large element of this sort may be introduced; and when the war is over, when our laboring population are restored to their homes and to their employments, when their participation in the war is no longer necessary, when they are laborers again at home, they will find this element which had been introduced during the pressure of the present time an element of competition against them, and we shall have trouble and difficulty in our domestic policy in the northern States from this cause.

But, sir, whether it be a policy in its nature good or evil, nothing appears to me more manifest and certain than that the exercise of such a power by this Government is wholly unwarranted, and that just and general objection against it will arise in all our northern States, and it will be another element of difficulty, of division, of trouble, of passion, and debate in our communities and in our political contests.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania whether he makes a distinction as to the question of authority, of constitutional power, between the measure now proposed and that which received the sanction of the Senate yesterday; I refer to the bill for the organization of a Bureau of Immigration to encourage migration from the populations of Europe, by authority of the General Government, the distribution of which is contemplated by the bill to be made in all sections of the country. I submit to the honorable Senator whether the power in that case is not as extensive and is not liable to the same objection there as here.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I not only did not participate in the debate upon the measure to which the Senator alludes, but I was not present when it was considered. I am speaking upon this measure with reference to its own merits and with reference to the considerations which apply to it, and I am not to be drawn off into a debate upon the question of the power of this Government to regulate immigration into the country from abroad, a perfectly distinct question and resting upon considerations that are not applicable to this measure. If the Senator desires my views upon the subject to which he refers, on the proper occasion when a measure of that description is before the Senate, if he conceives that I can afford him any information, to the best of my ability and power it shall be at his service.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course I did not wish to draw the Senator out, nor to do more than suggest that the power contemplated by this provision is precisely that which Congress exercised in establishing a Bureau of Foreign Immigration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will state to the Senator that of course the General Government has power to regulate the immigration of persons from abroad. There are clear powers applicable to that subject. Whether the General Government can enter upon the business of inviting persons from abroad and after they have entered into the country regulate their distribution in our communities is quite a different question, and one upon which I pronounce no opinion, though the inclination of my mind is against it.

Mr. MORRILL. That is precisely the question raised and settled in the bill to which I refer. The bill contemplates the encouragement of immigration from the old countries, and then takes the direction of the distribution of the population thus introduced, and it takes it without the slightest reference to consulting the States upon the subject. If it be conceded that the Federal Government has that authority to regulate the distribution of foreign immigration into this country, necessarily I submit it embraces the power indicated in this amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The proposition of the Senator from West Virginia, as I read it, is different from the proposition as expounded by himself. As I read it, I supposed he simply intended to throw upon the assistant commissioners and local superintendents an additional duty to this extent, of finding homes in the neighborhood, where abandoned plantations could not be found. I thought his purpose was charitable. I entered into it. I so said, and I was disposed to accept his proposition in that sense; but when I learned from his speech that he proposed to organize a system of migration, of transportation, of colonization in different States of this Union, under the auspices of the proposed bureau, I must confess I saw his proposition in entirely a different light. It seems to me the whole idea is entirely untenable; but even if it were at all tenable, it is out of place on this bill. I hope, therefore, that it will be voted down, and that we shall proceed with the bill.

Mr. WILLEY. I perceive the honorable Senator does not understand my proposition yet. There is nothing compulsory in any of its provisions. It expressly says that he shall perform the duty prescribed to him in the section I propose, "so far as may be practicable;" and the design of the section is simply this: that he should ascertain where labor is wanted, both in the insurrectionary States and out of those States; in Massachusetts, in Tennessee, in any other State; ascertain where labor is wanted, where the people desire to employ laborers of this character, and if, in his judgment, the person wishing it would be a suitable person, and the home would be a suitable one, and the compensation would be fair and just, to aid in that way he could within the scope and spirit of his appointment the freedman in getting to this home and in securing the employment. It is not my design to organize a system of compulsory emigration; it is not my design, nor will the section bear the interpretation, that these commissioners are compelled necessarily to force upon any community that does not desire this kind of labor these freedmen. The whole design and spirit of the section is that it shall be a matter of mutual consideration between the three parties, the commissioner, the freedman himself, and the person who desires to employ him and secure the benefit of his services; and I did think that such was the obvious advantage to the freedman himself in securing a home where he would obtain the protection of the law, the kindly sympathies of the people around him, and good labor at fair compensation, that there could hardly be an objection from any quarter to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I could not vote for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia as an independent proposition; but as an amendment to an obnoxious bill, with a view of perfecting the bill if it is to pass, I shall vote for the amendment. As the Senator from West Virginia has explained, there is no compulsion about it, and therefore it is not liable to the objection urged against it by the Senator from Pennsylvania. No State whose laws preclude the immigration of this class within its limits will be bound to receive them; but there are many free States that have no provision in their constitution or laws to prevent such persons entering those States. I think the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia presents a great question of practical benevolence to those States who have been most clamorous for this class of people. They have it in their power now to exhibit to the world and to an admiring world an example of the truth of the doctrines which they preach and profess. At a distance, thousands of miles from where this population was, they have shed crocodile tears over the barbarism of slavery and the inhumanity of slave-owners. Nothing has stirred their passions so much, awakened their sympathies so much, or caused so persistent efforts on their part for the relief of human suffering, as the situation of the poor, oppressed, down-trodden African. Now, by the operation of the military arm of the Government they have thousands of these people in their charge, a species of population who will be worthless to their former owners under any circumstances, a species of population who if they remain where they are must, under any circumstances, upon the return of peace be the greatest sufferers from the operations of this war—they have the power to take these poor creatures home among them and to see that those who have been wretched all their days, who have suffered naught but oppression at the hands of the white race, shall enjoy all the blessings of this sublime theory of theirs, "universal freedom and equality before the law."

Sir, tell me not, tell not the honest people of this country that the professions of the abolitionists are sincere; that they are honest in their efforts to set free this race unless they are willing to take them home, and give a practical illustration to the world of their sincerity by admitting them to an equality of rights among themselves. I am surprised that any man or any party professing to have at heart so much the interests of the negro race should refuse to avail of the privilege offered by the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Sit not quietly in your homes and shed crocodile tears over the barbarism of slavery and the inhumanity of southern slaveholders when you have the opportunity to go and take this oppressed race not only to live in your midst, but to take them to your heart and to cherish them as philanthropic men should cherish the object of their pity. Sir, it would be one of the most sublime spectacles ever witnessed on the face of the earth; it would be one of the strongest proofs that could possibly be furnished to the people of this country and the people of other lands if the abolitionists of this country now, in evidence of the sincerity of the doctrines which they have preached, would say, "Yes; we have a beautiful heritage up here in the North; our mountains are green; our valleys are fertile; our towns furnish innumerable workshops where this species of labor can be employed; our political institutions are free; we know no inequality among God's children; after preaching equality, we now evidence our sincerity by throwing open to you our own States and the enjoyment of the same political and social advantages which we ourselves enjoy." If this amendment be rejected by such votes as I have indicated, I apprehend that it will be impossible hereafter to make even the most stupid believe that modern abolitionism is anything else than absolute hypocrisy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Comess, Cowan, Foster, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Sherman, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I have not been able to attend the discussions that have taken place on this bill, and I do not know now its precise shape. I have three or four suggestions of amendment to make; but I do not know whether some of them may not already have been adopted. The Senator from Massachusetts probably knows as near what shape the bill is in as anybody.

Mr. SUMNER. I have tried to follow it.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to amend the fourth section by inserting after the word "departments" in line four the words "who may apply to him or to either of his assistants or local superintendents for relief;" so as to give the general superintendency of all freedmen who may apply for the benefit of it, rather than to force it upon all freedmen irrespective of their ability to take care of themselves.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the idea of the Senator is anticipated by an amendment which I have already moved. I have not the exact words of it here, but to the effect that the freedmen are in every respect to be treated as freemen, and that no power or control is to be exercised in regard to them except in conformity to law.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have that section read as it now stands.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Secretary be good enough to read the clause inserted on my motion at the end of the fourth section?

Mr. HOWE. Let the whole section be read as it stands.

The Secretary read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several departments, and it shall be his duty especially to watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen, and generally, by careful regulations, in the spirit of the Constitution, to protect these persons in the enjoyment of their rights, to promote their welfare, and to secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in every respect as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Mr. HOWE. Of course all control over these persons consistent with the language of the first part of the section is "in conformity with law," because that becomes a part of the law. Now, we have a large body of these freedmen all through the country; many of them are worth handsome properties, and a large majority of them are making a good living. I know that almost every northern man who comes North from the South, if he can, brings with him some of this labor: it is in demand in our part of the country. I have listened with great surprise to the intimations thrown out here that we are going to overburden our communities with this kind of labor by bringing it in there. I have a profound belief that the great necessity of every portion of our country is labor; and I have never listened with any patience whatever to the intimation, let it come from what source it may, that this Republic can tolerate the proposition to export this labor or any portion of it, which is really one quarter of the net value of the whole Republic as shown by your last census. But then, Mr. President, a great deal of this labor is managing itself, and I do not want to interfere with it, and I do not want this bureau to interfere with it.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot grasp the idea of the Senator; that is probably my misfortune; but I do not see what interference there can be from this Bureau with any such person as the Senator describes.

Mr. HOWE. Because it is given by the first clause of this section the "general superintendence" over all freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. The President of the United States has general superintendence over all citizens of the United States, bound by his oath to see that all the laws are executed; and that is all that is implied here.

Mr. HOWE. I think if the Senator will reflect a moment he will see that the President has no superintendence over anybody, except as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy he has superintendence over those persons in the military and naval service; but outside of them he has simply a superintendence over the laws. You have superintendents under your Indian laws. What are their duties? They are charged with the general superintendence over the officers appointed by the Government to execute the laws in relation to the Indians. They have not general superintendence over the Indians composing the Indian tribes; they cannot command a single one.

Mr. SUMNER. Can these superintendents command a single one here?

Mr. HOWE. I should think so.

Mr. SUMNER. By no means. That was discussed very thoroughly the other day, and I thought we arrived at a conclusion.

Mr. HOWE. I ought, perhaps, to concede that the Senator knows better the force of this language than I do; and yet I am profoundly impressed with the belief that it does give to the Commissioner the right to control the action and the efforts of all these freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. In what one particular, even to determine one single thing? His duty is to see that the laws and the proclamations and the military orders for the benefit of the freedmen are faithfully executed; and then still further he is to find, if possible, employment for the freedmen on land. Then still further he is to act as an advisory guardian. Then still further he is to be an arbitrator. But in no respect is he to exercise any power of control over the freedmen. The Senator finds it in the word "superintendence," but we only yesterday passed a bill creating a bureau or department or office of immigration, and creating an officer entitled the Commissioner of Immigration. What power or control will that give to that officer over immigrants? None at all. It will be his duty to watch over the laws with regard to immigrants for the public good and for the welfare of the immigrants; but there is no power of control over the immigrants conferred by the bill that we passed yesterday, I think unanimously, and there is no power or control here.

Mr. HOWE. I am entirely content to know that the Senator from Massachusetts desires no more from the operation of this bill than I do myself in this respect, and if he thinks the language employed here is sufficiently restrictive, I shall not insist on my amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I say most sincerely to the Senator that I feel sure on that point.

Mr. HOWE. I withdraw my amendment, and propose another in the fifth section to strike out in the tenth line the word "cause" and insert "permit."

Mr. SUMNER. Is the Senator aware of the amendment already made in that section?

Mr. HOWE. I am not. I desire to be informed.

Mr. SUMNER. The amendment which has been made on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] is to strike out the words "may determine," at the end of that sentence and insert other words so as to make the clause read, "or in case no proper lessees can be found, then to cause the same to be cultivated or occupied by the freedmen, on such terms in either case and under such regulations as the Commissioner and such freedmen may agree." I think that carries out the idea of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have prepared an amendment to the fifth section that will perhaps meet his views. I propose to strike out all after "and" in the seventh line down to the word "provided" in the thirteenth line, and in lieu of the words thus stricken out to insert:

To permit the freedmen to occupy, cultivate, and improve such real estate or any part thereof with the personal property aforesaid, or to rent, or lease, or act as inspectors of the same.

I am for some change in this section. As it stands it looks to me very much as though it was to take care of the plantations instead of the freedmen. The House bill had a provision in it to permit the freedmen to occupy, cultivate, and improve these lands; and this section proposes to do it if nobody can be found to whom to lease them; but if there is anybody who wants to lease the lands, they are to be leased. Now, I think the policy should be to have the freedmen independently take possession of, occupy, and improve these lands. We have in and about Washington and vicinity some twenty-five thousand freedmen who have been slaves. At Alexandria, at Hall's cross-roads, and elsewhere where they are cultivating land themselves they are prosperous and independent and are improving, while the twenty-five hundred who are under the Government organization across the river are the poorest off of any and are not improving, and the system there is a wretched system and ought to be broken up as speedily as possible. It is only a temporary measure, I trust. It is not intentionally badly managed; but the effect on these people is exceedingly bad; they are discontented and they have a right to be. A certain amount is deducted from their wages and they are held there under a rule that is irksome to them. But throughout the vicinity, where the freedmen have taken up little pieces of land and worked them for themselves they are improving and are independent; their schools are improving. I want this section changed so that in the first place it shall be the object of the Government to permit the freedmen to cultivate and improve these plantations, and then if the freedmen do not do it you may lease any plantation you have to somebody, but let that be the last thought.

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague understands that a plantation may be leased to a freedman. That was the idea of the committee. The language here is that they are to "rent or lease all such real estate, or any part thereof, with the personal property aforesaid." It does not say to whom they are to rent or lease it. It may be to a freedman, or it may be to a white person, if you will. It was felt that it would not be expedient to have any limitation on the power of the commissioners in that respect. It was thought better to leave open to them to determine on the spot to whom, all things considered, it would be best to lease the plantation; it might be to a freedman, or it might be to a white person; and I think on the whole that is the more prudent course. I think that my colleague has perhaps been misled by supposing that the language was exclusively applicable to white persons, but it is not so applicable. The language is general, and it was intended to cover the case of leases, whether to freedmen or to white persons. Then of course it goes on and says "or in case no proper lessees can be found;" that is, where they cannot find a freedman or a white person of sufficient responsibility to enter into a contract of lease, "then to cause the same to be cultivated or occupied by the freedmen, on such terms in either case and under such regulations as the Commissioner and such freedmen may agree."

Mr. HOWE. Now let me suggest to the Senator that the real force of that last clause is to authorize the Commissioner of Freedmen, an agent of the United States, to go to farming down there. By the language of this section as it was reported he was to go to farming, and I think to compel the labor of these freedmen, to cause them to occupy and cultivate these lands; but with the amendment which I am informed has been adopted on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, it becomes necessary for him to contract for the labor of the freedmen, and then hiring the labor he goes on to cultivate the lands on behalf of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to the Senator's word "permit" instead of "cause."

Mr. HOWE. I think that simple change will effect what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] and myself are aiming at, but his own proposition does no more than that.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move further to amend the same section by adding to it an additional proviso:

And provided further, That no lease and no permit to be given under the provisions of this act shall continue for a longer term than one year without renewal, nor shall any such lease or permit bind the United States to pay damages for any dispossession by title paramount to that of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to insert there before the word "dispossession" the word "military," and before "by" the word "or."

Mr. SUMNER. We are not liable anyway for military dispossession.

Mr. GRIMES. You will have an infinite number of cases set up for military dispossession after a while if you do not have a distinct understanding.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection if the Senator from Massachusetts has not.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to it.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin modify his amendment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, I so modify it that the latter clause shall read:

Nor shall any such lease or permit bind the United States to pay damages for any military dispossession or because of paramount title to that of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the tenth section by striking out in line five the word "quarterly," and inserting "monthly," striking out the words "of their proceedings" in the sixth line, and inserting after the word "commissioner" the words "of the names, ages, and respective conditions of all freedmen applying to them or to their local superintendents for relief, and of the disposition made of such applicants, which reports the Commissioner shall cause to be published in such newspapers, not exceeding one in each State, as he shall select."

Mr. SUMNER. I ask my friend whether that is not going to impose too much, and does not what he requires more properly come under the head of "rules and regulations" to be digested by the head of the Department? The Senator is perhaps not aware that the Secretary of the Treasury, who thus far has had the charge of the abandoned plantations, has prepared a very elaborate series of rules and regulations applicable to the management of these plantations and of the freedmen upon them. Those rules and regulations enter into a great many details. They were examined carefully by the committee in preparing this bill, and it was felt that in the bill we ought to avoid as much as possible going into details, leaving to the Secretary in his rules and regulations to do all that. It was thought that if we should attempt too much in this bill we might fail in everything, and we also felt that there was a certain difficulty in introducing into an act of Congress details, some of which might not be perfectly within our knowledge, in regard to which we might not be perfectly informed.

Now, I am not sure whether what the Senator requires by his amendment could be conveniently carried out; that is, a monthly report of all who apply. Suppose a very large number apply, or suppose the service is in cases where there is no strict application; for instance, suppose a large number, as some of the testimony shows is often the case, some five hundred or a thousand or more freedmen appear in a particular locality, and it becomes important for the Government to enter at once into the care and superintendence of that large number, would the Senator have the local officer at once report to the Department here the names of all those persons who thus present themselves? I do not know that it would not be desirable, but I doubt the expediency of requiring it in the bill. I think it is one of those details that had better be left to be regulated by the head of the Department.

Mr. HOWE. I am very sure that if we insert this clause there will be still enough of detail left for the consideration of the head of the Department which shall take charge of this work. I am quite aware that the Secretary of the Treasury has considered and published a large number of rules and regulations in reference to the management of these abandoned lands. I have seen but very few or none in reference to the management of these abandoned persons. He has not had much to do with them, and I do not know that the Government has had much if anything to do with them. Their former owners and masters have run away from them in some cases; in other cases they have run away from their former masters and owners, and they have come upon our hands, and we have held them in our hands, precisely how we do not know, and we never shall know until we take some pains to be informed. The Senator from Massachusetts stated, when he first introduced this bill, precisely what he wanted to do with it, and he stated what I thought to be precisely the right idea, to aid them in this transition state between bondmen and freedmen, not doubting, as I know the Senator does not doubt any more than I do, that in a very short time they will become in the fullest sense of the word freedmen, not only men with the right to take care of themselves, but men with the ability to take care of themselves, because only such men are free.

If that be the purpose of this bill, of course all they want is an opportunity to labor and permission to labor. Permission they get by the act of emancipation from whatever source it springs; opportunity they can get only by finding some chance to labor or somebody to employ them. I think it very essential that as often at least as once a month these agents of ours who shall take charge of these persons shall make public a list of all the persons they have on their hands unemployed, and shall also tell the country what distribution they have made of those who have been employed, and then we can see precisely the action of this bureau of ours; we shall know when it is doing and when it fails of doing the good that this act designs should be accomplished, and I am sure that no possible harm can spring from it in the world. The head of the Department, whichever Department takes charge, will I have no doubt provide much fuller information than this amendment that I propose does; but I thought it was due to the law itself that it should go so far as to provide this much of information.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator observes that the very section which he proposes to amend closes with these words, "and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required." We supposed of course that in the administration of the Department experience might be acquired which would lead to requiring reports different from those which we would anticipate in this bill. If the Senator desires the amendment, I shall not press opposition to it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to strike out the word "Treasury," in the third line of the first section, and to insert "War," and to make the corresponding change every where throughout the bill; and I will very briefly state the reasons why I think this change ought to be made.

The bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, placed the care of the freedmen under the War Department, and placed this bureau in the War Department. I have listened to what has been said here in favor of changing it to the Treasury Department, and I have read on both sides whatever I could find which would throw light upon that subject, and I must say that every moment's reflection satisfies me that this bureau ought to be in the War Department. Every amendment which has been made to the bill goes to show that the bureau belongs properly to the War Department. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and sustained by the general sentiment of the Senate, I think especially shows that this bureau ought to be in the War Department.

In the first place, the Treasury Department has no power in all this region of country except what it borrows. The Treasury Department has no power in the rebel States except what it gets from the Army and the Navy, and whatever has been done with the freedmen by the Treasury Department has been done with the leave of the War and Navy Departments. The Treasury Department has no power to use a soldier to fire a shot to protect or defend these freedmen, unless by the leave of the War Department or the officers serving under the authority of that Department. This bill is to operate in States in rebellion, which, so far as we govern them, are governed by the Army and by military law. Wherever our armies go, the freedmen follow the flag. They do not gather around the Treasury Department agents; they do not flock to those agents for protection. They gather around the flag of the country and the Army and Navy of the country for protection, and this is the only protection they have been able to find heretofore in this war, and it is the only protection they will find during the war. In the rebel States the military power is the only power that has any authority or respect from any quarter. It is a fact, as I am informed by General Thomas, the Adjutant General, who has been weeks and months up and down the Mississippi river, in Kentucky, in Tennessee, in Arkansas, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, who knows all about this subject, that the only protection the freedmen have is that which they derive from the military power, and that all the efforts of the Treasury Department have failed, and the very persons who have been under the charge of the Treasury agents are coming and begging for the protection of the military power.

The Army is needed to protect the freedmen while at work upon the plantations, and the Army is of course under the direction and guidance of the War Department. If another and independent organization exists to lease plantations and control the freedmen, an organization not connected with the Army, not under its protection and control, the result will be that men will be gathered together, will undertake the employments of industry, and then all at once your armies move off, and the men are left to the mercy of the guerrillas or the armed bands of the enemy. No man can deny the correctness of this, and General Thomas tells me that it is indispensable to the success and the protection of the freedmen that this bureau should be in the War Department, and I have met no man who I think understands this question so well as he does, and no man whose heart is more earnestly in the work.

Then there is another thing to be considered. The War Department can conduct this business with a great deal less expense than the Treasury Department. The War Department has its commissaries, its quartermasters, its means of support; and wherever the Army goes these persons flock to the Army for support and for protection. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] told us that the Secretary of the Treasury had the care of these plantations, but he could not find that he had the care of many freedmen. Certainly he has none; and why have not the freedmen rushed to Mr. Chase's plantations and gathered around Mr. Chase's agents? Because those agents have no power to protect them and cannot protect them, and cannot even feed them. They went to the Army in the first place because the Army had the power to protect them. They went to the Army in the next place because the Army had the means to feed them and clothe them, and the Army can feed and clothe them much cheaper than these new agents can do.

I say, therefore, that as a matter of protection to these colored people, I deem it indispensable that this bureau shall be in the War Department, and as a matter of economy on the part of the Government I think the argument is all in favor of putting the bureau in the War Department, that has all the organized machinery to carry it on. I do not know a single consideration in favor of putting it in the Treasury Department, except that it is said that the Treasury Department would like to have it. That I do not understand to be a reason why it should go there. We are told that the Treasury Department has charge of the lands. That is true, but those lands are under the control of law and under the direction of Congress, and to-day the freedmen who are cultivating these lands are there by the consent of the War Department, and are protected by the War Department; and wherever such is not the case, except on some of the islands on the coast of South Carolina, the thing is an utter failure, and I fear it will be a failure in this case.

I have moved this amendment because in my judgment it is better in every aspect in which the case can be viewed that this bureau should be in the War Department, because the War Department controls the armies; the rebel States are divided into military departments, and all the law we administer there is military law, and all the government we exercise over them is military government. Why we should take these people who now flock to the Army and have gathered around it for protection and support, from under the control of the War Department, and put them under the control of speculating Treasury agents, is a thing I cannot comprehend.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not like to take up time, but the Senate will pardon me if I utter one or two words in reply. So far as concerns the accusation brought by my colleague against the Treasury Department, that all its efforts in connection with the plantations have been a failure, I shall content myself with reading a sentence or two from a letter addressed to the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY,] It is written by an agent at Newbern, in North Carolina. It is as follows:

"Some three weeks since I reported to Mr. Chase that I had $50,000 ready to pay over for the benefit of the troops. I can now report that I can command $190,000 for this purpose, all collected and saved through the machinery of our agency. If the policy and plans already adopted in relation to the plantations referred to are not interrupted, the result next fall will be of the most gratifying character. Let me earnestly ask that these facts may be fully considered by Senators in due season."

I will not discuss further the accusation of failure on the part of the Treasury Department. As I have said, I am reluctant to say anything. I have already more than once in this debate argued the question in which Department this bureau should be placed; I have stated that I began the inquiry fully as strongly inclined as my colleague now appears to be in favor of the War Department. I was impressed by the other arguments which he has now put forth, and until I had carefully examined the question I was not able to answer those arguments; but just in proportion as I made myself familiar with it, I saw that those arguments were very easily answered. Sir, unless you wish to make this bill a torch of discord, you must place the care of the freedmen in the Treasury Department or you must go still further and take from the Treasury Department the care of the abandoned plantations. If my colleague would couple with his motion the further proposition that the care of the abandoned plantations should also be transferred to the War Department, I should have no objection. My object in all that I have done in this matter has been practical utility. That I feel would be sacrificed to a name if the motion of my colleague were adopted. Sir, there could be no practical utility from this bill if you place the care of the freedmen in the one Department and the care of the plantations in the other. By the logic of the case, by the humanity of the case, by the common sense of the case, those two must be placed in the same Department unless you wish in advance to sow discord and strife not only between the two Departments, but between the several local agents of each respectively.

I, sir, am not alone in these views. All those who have had occasion to consider the subject carefully and practically, whatever may have been their impression at the beginning, have been conducted to the same precise result. There is one cardinal principle which must be followed in determining where this bureau shall be lodged. You cannot depart from it without sacrificing the whole case. It is simply this: the care of the abandoned plantations and the care of the freedmen must go together; they cannot be separated. As Congress by successive acts of legislation has placed the care of the abandoned plantations in the Treasury Department, it must logically now place the care of the freedmen in the same Department. Why, sir, only this morning you have passed a bill almost unanimously which continues in the Treasury Department the care of the abandoned plantations, and couples with it also to a certain extent the care of the freedmen. It is as follows:

"That in addition to the captured and abandoned property to be received, collected, and disposed of, as provided in said act, the said agents shall take charge of and lease, for periods not exceeding twelve months, the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the districts therein named, and shall also provide, in such leases or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free."

Under that provision the Treasury Department will be confirmed still further in the care of the abandoned plantations, and it will also have associated with those plantations, as I have already said, to a certain extent the care of the freedmen; and yet it is proposed by my colleague by his amendment to transfer the care of the freedmen to the War Department. What then can the Secretary of the Treasury do for the freedmen; and, sir, if this bill becomes a law which has already passed this body to-day, I ask on the other side what can the Secretary of War do for the plantations? The Secretary of War cannot touch them, and yet he ought to be able to manage them in order to become the efficient benefactor of the freedmen.

My colleague dwelt on the power of the War Department, through its military agencies, as the natural protector of the freedmen. Sir, cannot the War Department, through those agencies, continue to exercise that protection? There is nothing in this bill to interfere with it; on the contrary, it is invited. Conferring the care and the superintendence upon the Treasury Department does not take from the War Department the duty or the power of protection.

Still further, I have already said on former occasions that if we look at the great body of freedmen we shall find that they are divided into two classes, those that may be called the military class, and the other those that may be called the predial class, the farm laborers. The military class, constituting perhaps one half at this moment, embracing those enlisted as soldiers or as laborers in the national forces, are naturally under the care of the War Department. They do not require the protection of this bill. But it is the other class that I have called the predial class or the farm laborers that require the protection of this bill, and that protection can be adequately afforded through the plantations. Whoever undertakes to protect them must be able to bring them in some way or other on to the plantations. Unless that can be done, nothing is done. I hope, therefore, the proposition of my colleague will not be adopted. I say frankly, that if it should be adopted I shall consider the bill worse than nothing. The bill that has already been passed by the Senate to-day will be far better than the bill as my colleague would make it, and I should be perfectly content with that if his proposition should prevail.

Mr. WILSON. My colleague says that the abandoned plantations and the freedmen ought to go together under the same Department. That may be true; but because we have put the plantations under the control of the Treasury Department I do not think it follows that we should put the freedmen under that Department. I think the freedmen ought to be put before the plantations. In the valley of the Mississippi the Treasury Department has signally failed and is failing to-day in protecting the plantations that have been leased and the freedmen that are upon them; and the persons who have rented estates are pleading and begging with the War Department for its protection. I admit that on the Atlantic coast, under the guns of our Army, the Treasury agents have been able to take care of a certain number of freedmen, and have been able to do it very well; but they could have done just as well even there if they had been agents of the War Department instead of the Treasury Department.

Now, sir, look at the condition of things. Our Army advances into Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, and the freedmen gather around the Army, welcome the Army, rally around the flag, and we enlist the able-bodied men as soldiers, or use them in the quartermaster's department or as laborers; but then there are the old men and the women and the children, those incapable of laboring, who are to be disposed of, taken care of. Is the Treasury Department able to do it? Are its agents there able to do it? Must they not for weeks, perhaps months, be supported by the Army? No doubt of it.

I am of the opinion still, notwithstanding the views of my colleague to which I am accustomed to pay great deference on this as on other questions, that this bureau should be in the War Department. My colleague tells me that everybody who has examined this subject thinks otherwise. I think he must certainly be mistaken about that. I have seen letters from some very clear-headed, practical, earnest men, maintaining the view which I have presented. I went to General Thomas, when he was recently here in Washington from the Southwest, and laid the matter before him. I went to him for information; I put the case before him, and asked him to give me information, and give me his opinion, which he did fully. I asked him on two subjects, one on the conduct of the colored men as soldiers, on which he wrote me a letter, and the other in regard to this bureau, and he expressed his opinion in the strongest manner in favor of putting this bureau in the War Department, and on the ground of the protection of the freedmen and economy to the Government.

Mr. SUMNER. My simple proposition was that the plantations and the freedmen must go together. I am perfectly willing that the freedmen should go to the War Department if my colleague will see that the other matter is placed there also. He must not consider me as opposed to the War Department; he must only consider me as bowing to the exigency of the case, bowing to its logic, to its reason. I have not followed my partialities or my prejudices, for those would have carried me with my colleague. I have simply hearkened to what seemed to me to be unanswerable reason. For instance, here are the words of General Banks:

"The assignment of the abandoned or forfeited plantations to one Department of the Government, and the protection and support of the emancipated people to another, is a fundamental error, productive of incalculable evils, and cannot be too soon or too thoroughly corrected."

Then the freedmen's commission, composed of Mr. Owen, Colonel McKay, and Dr. Howe, after reviewing some of the reasons bearing on this question, conclude:

"After the most thorough investigation, I am authorized in saying that this is the deliberate judgment of the commission."

That was the cardinal idea which guided the committee in preparing the bill; and it was because they did not feel authorized to propose to the Senate to take from the Treasury Department the care of the abandoned plantations that they felt it their duty to propose to place the care of the freedmen in that Department.

Mr. WILSON. I have made this motion and stated my reasons for it, and my judgment is not convinced by anything my colleague has said; but I have this feeling: this subject has been committed to him, he has examined it; he has brought forth this bill; he strenuously maintains this position. I think it an error; I do not believe in the position. I believe it would be better to have the freedmen under the War Department and have the lands there too.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. But there seems to be a difficulty in bringing that about at this moment. I do not wish to take the responsibility of giving a turn to this bill contrary to the wishes of my colleague, who has had the direction of it; and having stated my judgment and opinion, and they remain unchanged, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the select committee on slavery and freedmen, as it has been amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to except to two of the amendments to the amendment made in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that but one amendment comes up for concurrence, and that is the amendment of the committee as amended, a substitute for the original bill. The Senator can move to amend that amendment before it is concurred in.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line eight of section two the words "the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and inserting "the Secretary of the Treasury." That was the original form of the bill. My objection is in the first place that it causes at once a discord between this bill and the bill which the Senate has passed to-day relating to abandoned property and plantations. In that bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint agents who are to enter into possession of the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements, and to proceed also to find, as far as practicable, employment for the freedmen. I was aware of that bill while this was pending, and one or two amendments which I introduced into this bill were to bring it completely into harmony with that, so that the two bills should work together. But the proposition which was moved by the Senator from Iowa, and which I now propose to amend, causes a discord. If the Senator from Iowa will look at it, he will see that the very service which by the bill now under consideration is to be performed by an assistant commissioner to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, under the other bill may be performed by an agent who receives his appointment from the Secretary of the Treasury alone. I wish to bring the two bills into harmony. That is my single object. But for that I should not make the proposition. The Senator from Iowa will remember that I did not oppose his amendment when he offered it yesterday; but now that the Senate has passed the other bill, in order that both of them may work well, that each may perform its function properly and without any discord between the two, I ask that my bill shall be brought back to its original character by striking out the words introduced on the motion of the Senator from Iowa and inserting "the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. GRIMES. If there was anything that could astonish me more than the original proposition in this bill authorizing the appointment of these officers at the mere ipse dixit of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, after the subject has been thoroughly discussed and a conclusion arrived at by the Senate, to restore the provision as it was originally in the bill. What are these commissioners? As the bill now stands, two of these commissioners are to be appointed for each State. As an example, take the States of Mississippi and Louisiana. Each of those States is to be divided into two departments; each commissioner will probably have the superintendence of two or three hundred thousand colored men. They are to have, each of them, the superintendence and charge of the renting, the disposing, the leasing, the receipt of the rents for one half of all the plantations within the State. Millions of dollars probably in a year will pass through their hands. And yet it is proposed to us by the Senator from Massachusetts that we shall not direct these commissioners to be appointed, as in ordinary cases, by the President of the United States and to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States, but that they shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and be mere tenants at his will. I am unwilling to confer any such power as that on any Secretary, or upon the President of the United States himself, without there being the constitutional check upon him of a confirmation by the Senate of the United States. What are we here for but to give our advice and consent to the appointment and confirmation of such responsible officers as these? We have declared here this session that every acting master in the Navy, to whom you pay the small sum of $1,000 a year, shall be appointed by the President and sent here to be confirmed by us, men who are merely required to perform watch duty on the decks of your men-of-war, through whose hands not one dollar of money is to pass, to whom is confided no such great trusts as are confided by the provision of this bill to your commissioners. The names of such men as these, by the action of the Senate and doubtless by the vote of the Senator from Massachusetts, are required to be sent to the Senate for our advice and approval; and yet it is seriously proposed that these commissioners, who are to have the control of hundreds of thousands of human beings, of whose character for humanity and discretion we know nothing and can know nothing, who are to have the control of hundreds of thousands and doubtless millions of property in the course of a year, are not to be sent to the Senate for us to advise and consent to their confirmation. We are not to be permitted to know anything in regard to their character; they are to hold their offices not by any regular tenure of office, but to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to hold during his good will and pleasure.

Mr. President, I confess to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have been anxious to vote for his bill. I told him at the beginning of the consideration of it that several amendments must be made to it before I would vote for it, and this is one of the amendments that must be made before I will vote for it. I never will consent, so long as I occupy a seat in this body, to agree to place in the hands of any officer of the Government, I care not where he is—I have as much respect for the Secretary of the Treasury as any man has, but I never will consent to place in the hands of any Government officer the overwhelming power that is being placed in the hands of this public officer by the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. I want to know the character of these men. I want to know the character they have maintained hitherto. I want to know whether they are humane men, whether they are Christian men, whether they are honest men and will do their duty to the men, women, and children who are committed to their charge, and if the Senator's proposition is adopted I unhesitatingly say that I will vote against the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the amendment will be adopted, though I shall regret very much to lose the Senator's vote.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I move now another amendment. I move to strike out the proposition which was moved by the Senator from West Virginia. It is in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the said Commissioner cannot find abandoned real estate on which to employ all of the freedmen who may come under his care and control by virtue of this act, it shall be his duty, so far as may be practicable, to provide for them homes and employment with humane and suitable persons at fair and just compensation for their services; and that in order the more effectually to accomplish this purpose the said Commissioner shall open a correspondence with the Governors and the various municipal authorities of the different States requesting their cooperation in this behalf.

Instead of moving to strike out, I will send to the Chair a substitute, to strike out all after the word "that," and insert:

Whenever there is no abandoned real estate on which to employ the freedmen, it shall be the duty of the assistant commissioners and local superintendents, so far as may be practicable, to aid the freedmen in obtaining homes and employment with humane and suitable persons at a fair and just compensation for their services.

Mr. WILLEY. That amendment, as I understand it, proposes to confine its operation simply to the insurrectionary States. If that be the correct understanding of its operation it amounts to nothing at all, as the bill itself will amount to nothing at all. Allow me to suggest to Senators that if the bill is to have any practical effect whatever it will be in the provisions contained in the amendment which I had the honor to offer and which the Senate some time ago adopted. You cannot find any place in the insurrectionary States where these assistant commissioners can put these freedmen where they can remain safely and work a plantation for one year unless they are protected by a large military force. There is not a section of the country of any considerable extent anywhere in the insurrectionary States where the freedmen would be allowed to remain long enough to raise a crop without being destroyed by guerrillas, by those roving bands of ruffians who are ready for blood and plunder wherever they can find an opportunity of indulging their propensity in that behalf, and who are especially exasperated against these freedmen and would take special pains to destroy them. The result then of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, if it should be adopted, as I humbly conceive, would be to strike from the bill the only practical provision in it that can affect these freedmen for any benevolent or judicious purpose.

Mr. President, allow me to say that the practical result of this bill without my amendment will be to organize a corps of well-paid office-holders who dare not go into the districts in which it is proposed that they shall operate, to have them paid at the expense of the United States for remaining at home, and to have them paid for duties which they dare not and cannot execute. I beg Senators to reflect a moment and ask themselves the question where, at this time, there is a plantation within the whole scope of the insurrectionary territory of the United States on which it would be wise or expedient or possible to place any number of these freedmen, and to keep them there for six months? Where is the section or territory in which it can be done? If there be any such I do not know it. Perhaps in the vicinity of our forts and a little distance from them, where they are under the protection and under the eye of the military authorities, this can be done; but yet we have reports almost daily that bands of guerrillas seize these men and murder them or carry them off to a worse slavery than they have ever endured.

But here is a proposition that has something practical in it, that has something benevolent in it, that will take these freedmen from the miserable condition in which they are now placed, that will secure them homes where no such danger exists, that will secure them homes where they are not under the arbitrary control of these commissioners and assistant commissioners, but where they are under the protection of the laws and courts, where they are in the midst of a benevolent community who will see that they suffer no wrong, where they are in the reach of our judicial tribunals and the executive officers of the law to protect them in their rights and redress their grievances. All that my amendment proposes is that these freedmen shall, with the assent of the people of the free States and under the direction and with the approbation of these commissioners, have homes provided for them in those States, nothing more. There is nothing compulsory in it. It is provided that it shall only be done where it is practicable and so far as it is practicable. If the laws of any State prohibit the introduction of free negroes, then it is impracticable and my amendment does not apply. If the people do not want them in any of the free States then my amendment does not apply, for it is not practical except by the consent of the parties who wish to employ them.

I ask Senators, then, whether they are willing to mutilate the only practical and beneficial provision that there is in the bill under existing circumstances, by striking from it the part of it that would render the remaining portion utterly nugatory. If we sincerely desire, as I do and as I trust every Senator does, to be good to these freedmen, really to provide homes for them, really to advance their condition, really to do a good act toward them, I beg the Senate not to strike out this provision; for it does seem to me that it is the only practical provision in the whole bill that will operate for their good under existing circumstances. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to strike it out and let the bill be without any practical effect, so be it. The result, I assure Senators, will be simply to create a corps of well-paid officers and impose them upon the finances of the country, without any other practical effect than that. I think this is not a time when we can afford the money to do it.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt the Senator from West Virginia makes this proposition in good faith and for the good of the freedmen; but I think there is this error in it: he proposes not only to empower these commissioners to secure employment for these freedmen at a fair compensation, which is all very well, but that they shall open a correspondence with the Governors of States and the municipal authorities of the States on the subject. I think if that provision remains in the bill it is liable to be misrepresented throughout the country. Suppose an application is made by these officers to the Governor of some State, and that Governor gives consent or makes any arrangement; then there will be fault-finding, misrepresentation, and denunciation. Suppose he declines to do it; then another class of men will denounce him for it. It seems to me that this opening of a correspondence with the official authorities for the employment of these freedmen will have a tendency to weaken the bill before the country, to weaken the workings of the measure, and to weaken the Government. It is liable to misrepresentation throughout the country, and therefore I hope it will not remain in the bill in that form.

The first half of the amendment, it seems to me, has no harm in it, and may do a great deal of good. Under it a great many persons, farmers, mechanics, business men, persons wishing to obtain the services of these freedmen, may apply to the commissioners for their services, and they can make such arrangements as they please. I am willing that that provision shall go on the bill, giving the commissioners power to make such an arrangement with any persons, and then leave it free to those persons to apply to them for the services of the freedmen. But to open this correspondence with the Governors of the States, and with the municipal authorities of cities and towns, will, in my judgment, have a bad influence in the country, and I do not think it will tend to secure the employment of these persons. If the Senator would abandon the latter half of his measure, and stand upon the first part of it, I certainly would not object to it; but in the form in which it now is, it seems to me it subjects this whole policy to the carping misrepresentation of a class of men in this country who seem to think they elevate themselves by treading upon an oppressed race.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this bill must stand or fall upon its own merits, and it will not be affected one way or the other by the carping misrepresentations to which the Senator alludes. I confess that the amendment which has been placed upon the bill by the Senator from West Virginia strikes me as being one of the most beneficial that has yet been added to it. I think it will do more to give unity and direction to the sentiment of the country in regard to the improvement and, so to speak, the dispersion of this labor in those localities where it is most needed, where it can be most serviceable, than any other feature of the bill.

So far as the mere correspondence is concerned, I do not see very well how those who are in charge of these persons are to understand where they can get homes for them, or obtain the information in regard to where their labor will be most in demand, unless they do it by correspondence; and they have got to do it either by correspondence with unofficial persons, with persons of whom they can have no specific knowledge, or else with those who are interested directly in assisting the development of the labor of their respective communities. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia does not confine this correspondence to the Governors of States and the municipal authorities, but all those throughout the land who may be desirous of getting labor of this kind, or of assisting in this work, are invited to come forward and let it be known. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts has been as solicitous as any other Senator on this floor to obtain the assistance of these freedmen in one department of the service, that is, the military department of the service, and that not alone for the United States but for the State of Massachusetts, and not alone for the State of Massachusetts but for the various localities that have to fill up their quota under the draft. If that system applies as regards furnishing them for the military service, why should it not be extended to filling up the ranks of industry in other walks of life? I trust that nothing that has been said in regard to the mere correspondence which may be preliminary to finding homes for these people will be suffered to interfere with or to prejudice the amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe this motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to inquire if this motion fails whether it would be in order then to make a motion simply to strike out the same amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it would be.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe the amendment moved by the Senator from West Virginia is moved with the very best of intentions, and has, apparently, a very benevolent aim; and yet I doubt very much the propriety or the policy of putting into this bill a provision that the commissioners who are to be appointed under it shall open a correspondence with States and municipal authorities, who have not had anything to do with this question of the freedmen, to see if they cannot find places and employment for them. I think it goes on a wrong supposition altogether. I do not think that these people, when freed, are in our hands, or in the hands of any commissioner, or in the hands of anybody, to be controlled or bargained for. This control that is to be put over them by this Freedmen's Bureau bill should be as light as possible. Many of them, most of them, probably, can take care of themselves, and the less we do with them the better. I do not propose to inaugurate a system here that shall be thrown over the land like a net, and gather up these freedmen and take the guardianship of them. I take it, when they are free, they are men like us, and they have just about as much right to come and take us into custody and see if there is not somebody that will give us places, as we have to take them in charge and open a correspondence to find them places.

There are some, I admit, who while they are undergoing this process from slavery to freedom should have some guardianship. There are some who are very aged; others who are degraded and ignorant. I think there is a necessity for this bill to some extent, but we should make it as little and as light as possible and get out of it as quick as we can. If we are to exchange slavery in this country for a sort of guardianship established by law to be perpetuated year after year, then I am sick of it. I do not propose to do any such thing. I look upon this only as a temporary arrangement for a year or two till these people can take care of themselves; and the less we legislate, the less we put into this bill about providing for them and taking care of them in the future, I think the better—the better it will suit me at any rate. I want as little correspondence with States where there are prejudices against them as possible. If this Commissioner was to open a correspondence with the Governor of almost any State in the Union proposing to find places for them in that State, although the Governor might be in favor of it, yet there is always a political party to make a fuss about it, and it will become an unpopular thing. I do not believe that West Virginia would allow them within her limits. I know that Illinois, Indiana, and most of the northwestern States would be entirely opposed to it. I do not believe the thing ought to be shadowed forth in the law. It should not look as if we intended to take these people into our custody and provide for them as if they were children and wards. The great majority of them should never be touched. The great majority of them can take care of themselves, and have always taken care of themselves and their masters too, and this system should only be applied to the few unfortunate ones who may be ignorant, degraded, or aged.

Mr. WILLEY. I must say that I concur in most of what the honorable Senator from Kansas has said. I myself, as the Senate will remember, objected to this bill because it was throwing a control over these freedmen which I did not consider justifiable or right; but that is the principle of the bill. The bill itself, without this provision in it, contains the very objectionable feature mentioned by the honorable Senator from Kansas. It does assume a guardianship and a very great control over these freedmen. They cannot, under the provisions of this bill, make a contract without the assent of these commissioners, and in various respects by the provisions of the bill independent of the section which I have offered they are placed under the control, direction, care, supervision, and management of these commissioners and assistant commissioners. The fundamental principle of the bill is one of control over these freedmen. Although I object to that principle, and object to the bill on that ground, yet the amendment which I have offered, and which the Senate adopted, was in strict conformity with the spirit and principles of the bill, and it was designed to carry out the bill in its spirit and fundamental principle, as I thought, in a manner more beneficial than any other provision of the bill.

The Senator from Kansas misinterprets the effect of that portion of the amendment which it is proposed to strike out. It does not propose that the freedman shall, without his consent, be carried into a free State, or be placed in the management of any individual anywhere. It simply proposes to ascertain where there may be homes and employment found for the freedman which, with his consent, he may be provided with, and through the aid and influence of these commissioners may be secured in the enjoyment of a home and employment, all with his own free consent and under the same provisions of control only that are contained in the other portions of the bill. Let it be understood that it is no part of the proper effect of this amendment, nor of my design in offering it, to impose any more constraint over the person, the labor, or the rights and liberties of the freedman than the other provisions of the bill inevitably exert over him. It is simply to carry out the design of the bill under the machinery provided in other parts of it so as to secure him a better home and better wages in a community where he will receive better treatment and be better protected by the laws than he can be upon the abandoned plantations of the South.

I put it to every Senator here candidly to say whether, if it be so that these freedmen can have homes thus provided for them and can have employment thus provided for them in the free States, under the protection of law, in communities where they will thus be placed, thus secured by the law and by the spirit of the community in which they live, it would not be better for them than to find them employment on these plantations where they will be subject to the attacks of guerrillas, to the arbitrary control of these assistant commissioners, where there is no law to protect them, where there is no public sentiment to protect them, but a public sentiment bitter and persecuting existing against them, that will seize all occasions and pretexts and opportunities to embarrass them. That is just the view of the case; and this being the fact, which I think cannot be denied, that such homes as I propose to find for them would be better for the freedmen, and their security of life and property and liberty would be more certainly secured to them, I ask the honorable Senators from Massachusetts why it is, under this state of facts, that they object to this section of the bill. I ask, if it be better for the freedmen that they should thus find homes and employment in the North, why do those Senators object to the operation of this section, and to its remaining in the bill?

Our common design is to benefit the freedmen. Our common design is to secure them the best employment and the best wages. Our common design is to secure to them that position that will elevate them more speedily and readily to a proper platform, where they will be, in point of fact, more equal before the law. I put it to every honorable Senator to say whether a position on the farms or in the shops of the North, under the protection and shadow of law and surrounded by such a community as live there, would not be better for them than to leave them loose under the arbitrary control and will of these Commissioners in the South, surrounded by prejudices and passions, and liable to the incursions of guerrillas and dangers of all kinds? If so, is it not inconsistent that objection should be interposed to prevent the greater benefit to these freedmen that this section will most certainly secure to them?

Mr. CONNESS. I examined this amendment when it was first offered, and there occurred to my mind some serious objections to it. It was right in the cursory examination that I gave it, it proposes a correspondence with the Governors of the free States with the view of providing homes for the freedmen in those States. My first objection to it is that we have sufficient excitement, we have sufficient discussion, we have sufficient of the subject of negro slavery and the freedom of negroes, as the matter now stands, without enlarging the area of that excitement and increasing it by attempting a special correspondence and discussion with the Executives of all the States on the subject. How will it be with the State of Illinois? Can there be an issue made there, where they do not wish free negroes in their State and the law prohibits them?

Mr. WILLEY. With the leave of the honorable Senator, it does seem to me that the effect of this section is, I was going to say persistently, misunderstood. It only proposes to find homes for these freedmen where it is practicable, and so far as it may be practicable. Where the constitution or the laws of the States prohibit the introduction of this class of population, it is not practicable, and therefore the section does not apply.

Mr. CONNESS. That was my impression of it exactly. How can you know where it is practicable to find homes for them without an inquiry to that end? It is that very inquiry that seems objectionable to me. Why shall the negroes be deported or changed from the southern States, where they were born and bred, where their labor has heretofore been expended, where they are, if you please, acclimated? Why shall we institute a system by a provision of law providing for such deportation or change, or instituting inquiries to that end?

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the amendment is predicated, and so states, upon the idea that it is only where employment cannot be found for them and suitable provision made for them in their present localities, that the commissioners are to open this correspondence with a view of finding them employment elsewhere.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understand it, and it is implied by that very predication that homes and employment cannot be found for them in the southern States. Is that true? I take it it is not true. I think the whole amendment is based upon this idea, which is entirely repugnant and objectionable to me, the common expression we so frequently hear, "Now that you have freed these negroes, take some of them to your own homes and take care of them; take them to your own States; take them to your own doors, and see how you like them;" and the advocates of the system of negro slavery go so far as to say, "Take them to your own parlors, take them into your families, take them to your beds." I do not think that this class of expressions even deserves a response or a reply; but it is a sentiment that prevails very widely. Men who have been educated in accordance with the system of human slavery feel themselves at once attacked and aggressed when you talk of freeing slaves. In many instances, gentlemen who have freed their own slaves feel that they have a right to do as they please, they have a right to free their slaves, and they have a special right to discuss the question of slavery in all its forms, but they do not concede as free a right in such discussion to us who were not educated in slavery or with it. They think they understand it all, and that no other persons can understand it as well as they; and when we enter upon the discussion of the question now so deeply affecting our nation's interests, indeed vitally affecting them, we are very generally responded to by being told, "You are trenching upon our proper sphere and ground; you are without your proper bounds;" and we are told within and without the Senate, "Take these people to your States, take them to your homes, take them to your firesides." We are now asked in this amendment to pass a law by which we shall say to the Governors of the States, "How many of these people can you take?" I object to the very groundwork of the amendment. I object to the basis upon which it is placed and predicated. I object to the incorporation of such an amendment into this bill, and I hope Senators will not so vote.

It is not surprising that my honorable friend from Missouri should differ widely from me upon a proposition of this kind or any other, but I thought when I read it that he had taken a mistaken view of it, or did not clearly understand the basis upon which it was predicated. I say the implication that homes cannot be found for these men who are able to work and labor in the States where they were born and bred is not true, cannot be true. If indeed pending a condition of war many of those persons shall be found without employment, is it any wonder? Shall they not bear their part of the burden? Shall they not make their partial sacrifices pending this war? Shall we undertake to deport them to other States pending war? Why, sir, it is a proposition very near akin to the system we entered upon at the beginning of this war, or soon after it, of deporting the negroes to other countries and climes. I hope the amendment will not be adopted for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say, sir, that I do not entertain the antipathy which the Senator from California seems to feel to the presence of this class of persons among us.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will permit me right here to say that I think I have said nothing from which he could deduce the existence of any such antipathy.

Mr. BROWN. Well, I misunderstood you. Mr. CONNESS. I wish then to be clearly understood, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will correct myself by saying I have none of the antipathy which the Senator from California seems to think other people have to having these persons among them.

Mr. CONNESS. That will do. I did not attribute any to the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. For my own part I have seen them performing labor all my life, and my objection has been, not to them or their labor, but to the institution of slavery. It is that that I have been fighting, and not the negroes.

Now, sir, I will state that, so far as my own experience goes, the demand is very great in large sections of our country for labor; there are hundreds and thousands of persons who would be glad to give homes to these freedmen, and there are hundreds of localities in which their labor would be far more serviceable than congregated as they are upon the very narrow strip of land that is held by us on the banks of the Mississippi. There is scarcely a steamboat that comes from the lower Mississippi and lands in my own city that does not bring up hundreds of these freedmen. They are congregated there, and there is a demand for them, not only in my own State and in my own city and county, but in the neighboring States along the Mississippi river. I think that that dispersion should be encouraged. I am certainly sure that in cases such as are contemplated in this bill, cases of suffering, cases where there is no ample provision made for their sustenance or labor, where there is such an accumulation and redundancy of them that they must either suffer or be dispersed into more favorable localities, it is wise and well for us to assist and facilitate them in seeking and procuring homes.

I do not apprehend much danger from this clamor that has been spoken of; but if it is to come, let us meet that clamor as we have met every other clamor on this subject; let us meet it and face it and fight it out and fight it down, and I think the country will be the better for it, and we shall be the better for it.

Mr. HICKS. I do not desire to prolong this discussion. I wish only to say a word or two upon it.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this whole measure. If we propose to free the slaves of the country, let them be free indeed. I, for one, am unwilling that my slaves when freed shall become the slaves of others. As my friend from West Virginia has very well said, the commissioners and assistant commissioners to be appointed under this bill will be, in fact, nothing but overseers and slave-drivers, and the result will be that the negroes will be as much slaves under this arrangement as they are now. I suppose none of us of the South will be considered as qualified to act on such a subject, and so we shall have gentlemen from the North to act as commissioners. My experience goes to show, and I have had not a little experience in that way, that the hardest slave-drivers we have ever had in the slave States have been northern men—men who have come from the free States and married women owning a number of slaves. I know that to be the case. Therefore, if we have to turn our slaves loose—and I pray God it may be done at the very earliest possible moment; I love my Government more than I do slavery—if they are to become freedmen, let them be free men in fact as well as in name.

Senators seem to suppose that these people are not capable of taking care of themselves. We have, as I said the other day, a larger population of free colored people in the county from which I come than any county in Maryland. The city of Baltimore has a larger population of them. We have as many industrious, honest, worthy colored people as are to be found anywhere. There are none of them who will labor who cannot make a comfortable living, who are not serviceable not only to themselves and their families but to those who employ and hire labor. Many of them are in a vast deal better condition than a very considerable portion of our white people.

But, sir, no regard seems to be paid now to any other than the colored race. Where is the difference in allowing these people to remain as they are, where they were born and raised, where all their early attachments and the attachments that have grown up with them exist, and putting them under the new overseers and drivers proposed by this bill? I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not want them to remain in their present condition. I disclaim all feeling of that sort. I am as decidedly in favor of emancipation as any Senator on this floor. But, sir, it is now proposed to take our slaves away from us and put them upon plantations under the management of cruel drivers; and yet the poor creatures are said to be free! I do not think that will be a beneficial change; I cannot see any reason for pursuing such a course; and therefore I am opposed to the whole thing. Let these people be made free; I am in favor of that; and if they strive to do so they can live just as well in the places around which all their native attachments cluster, and where they desire to remain, as they can anywhere else. Rent out your desolated farms if you choose to do so, and let the men who take them pay the rent and employ and pay for the labor necessary to the carrying on of their farming operations.

Sir, I believe that by this measure you are really taking these people out of the frying-pan and putting them into the fire. I think the whole thing wrong, and I shall vote for no bill of the sort. I am for freeing these people entirely, and teaching them to rely upon their own resources for a livelihood. I know there are many worthless creatures among them, very poorly calculated to take care of themselves and their families; but let them learn; let us educate these people to labor and to take care of themselves. There are many of them who are sensible enough to know that by their own conduct and their own course they are to gain reputation. There seems to be a disposition, however, among Senators who claim to be the special guardians of these people to put them again under drivers just as they are now; and yet they talk about the equality of the races, and claim to be the particular friends of the colored race! Many of the free States, by enactments of their Legislatures, have refused to allow people of color to come into their States. I maintain that these gentlemen have no right to take our slaves away, or, when we make them free, put them upon farms and use them probably with much more severity than their masters used them when they were slaves. I think the whole thing is wrong, and I shall vote against the whole of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to withdraw the amendment which I submitted, and ask that a direct vote may be taken on the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia, and on that I shall content myself with one remark.

The Senator insisted that his amendment was to carry out the object of the bill. I would not say anything except respectfully and kindly of the Senator, but I cannot recognize him as an interpreter of the object of the bill. There are those on this side of the Chamber who might better perform that office. I do not recognize his amendment as carrying out the object of the bill. I think its introduction into the bill will be mischievous. I do not mean to suggest that the Senator offers it with any such purpose, but we all know that the Senator did not begin this discussion in any friendly spirit toward the bill. He may have changed now; but I am sure that this proposition if adopted will do the bill no good. I hope it will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his amendment, so that the question now is simply on striking out the words indicated.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the said Commissioner cannot find abandoned real estate on which to employ all of the freedmen that may come under his care and control by virtue of this act, it shall be his duty, so far as may be practicable, to provide for them homes and employment with humane and suitable persons at fair and just compensation; and that in order the more effectually to accomplish this purpose the said Commissioner shall open a correspondence with the Governors and the various municipal authorities of the different States requesting their cooperation in this behalf.

Mr. ANTHONY. The motion I understand is to strike out those words?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were inserted in Committee of the Whole and now stand in the bill, and the question is on striking them out in the Senate.

Mr. WILLEY. If it be at all more acceptable to Senators on the other side, I have no objection to modify the section in the latter part of it, so as to make it read as follows:

And that in order the more effectually to accomplish this purpose the said Commissioner shall open a correspondence with such persons and municipal authorities in the different States as will most cordially cooperate with him in this behalf, requesting their assistance.

I have no objection to modify it in that form.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is it competent for the Senator so to modify the amendment if there is an objection to that modification?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not competent for the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Delaware to modify the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Delaware does not wish any modification. The Senator from Delaware simply rose to ask whether the Senator from West Virginia could modify an amendment which has been adopted by the Senate, without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out a portion of the amendment which has been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and that is competent and proper.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senate will not adopt that amendment. The amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole brought the direct issue before the American people whether the States not interested in slavery, but who have so persistently advocated the policy of slavery, were willing to receive into their midst this species of population, and the proposition to test their sincerity was to be made by the highest official of their States. The amendment now suggested by the honorable Senator from West Virginia would lead to this result, that communication might be opened up with "such persons"—abolition societies perhaps—"and municipal authorities as will cordially cooperate in this behalf." I object to that because I want the question put directly to those who exercise power and who administer government in those States. I wish to know whether they will evidence the sincerity of their professions by, in their official character, agreeing to accept their proportion of this population, that they may live in their midst and enjoy the blessings of their philanthropy.

Mr. WILLEY. I suppose it would not be in order for me now to offer this as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it would not be.

Mr. WILLEY. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his proposition to amend by striking out the whole section, until it can be seen whether the Senate will incorporate this instead of a portion of what is proposed to be stricken out, I will offer it as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that if the Senate refuse to strike out the section it will be in order for the Senator from West Virginia to move to amend by striking out and inserting something else.

Mr. WILLEY. Suppose they do strike out, would it then be in order to insert this amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot decide that without seeing the amendment; probably it might be.

Mr. WILLEY. The amendment is to insert the words I have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator might offer it as a new section.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose it is in order to move an amendment with a view to perfect a clause before the vote is taken on striking it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Simply for the perfection of the clause, not to strike out and insert something else.

Mr. HOWE. The motion is to strike out the whole clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOWE. And the motion of the Senator from West Virginia is to amend the clause which it is proposed to strike out. That motion is in order, I take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order, being an amendment in the third degree. There are two amendments pending before the Senate. The bill itself on which the Senate is acting is an amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Ramsey, Sautsbury, Van Winkle, and Wiley—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. When this subject was before the Senate on a former day I opposed that portion of the bill which transfers the power which the bill professes to give, to the Treasury Department, being satisfied it ought to be in the War Department. I move therefore to amend the bill by striking out the word "Treasury" in the third line of the first section and substitute the word "War," and also the same amendment in the third line of the second section. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose the Senator means to strike out the word "Treasury" wherever it occurs.

Mr. JOHNSON. If this amendment should be adopted, that will follow, as a matter of course.

Mr. CONNESS. But it may all be included in the same motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. My amendment proposes to strike it out in two places.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on striking out the word "Treasury" and inserting "War" in the first place named, the third line of the first section. If that should be adopted, the others will follow as a matter of course to make the bill conform to the action of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Foot, Grimes, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sautsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, and Wright—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to state that my design was to vote just the opposite of the way my vote is recorded. I suppose it is too late now to change it, the vote having been announced, but I wish it understood that my intention was to vote exactly the opposite way.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment adopted on motion of the Senator from West Virginia, by striking out all after the word "services" in the following words:

And that in order the more effectually to accomplish this purpose, the said Commissioner shall open a correspondence with the Governors and the various municipal authorities of the different States, requesting their cooperation in this behalf.

I will simply say that the first portion of that amendment which has been sustained by two votes of the Senate authorizes the Commissioner to secure places of labor for these freedmen anywhere in the country where he can find them. The authority, therefore, is vested in him, and he may exercise his discretion in having a correspondence with anybody. The people of the whole country may write to him if they choose. Why therefore insert in this bill a provision that he shall open a correspondence on this subject with the Governors and municipal authorities of the States? Take many of the States or cities, and suppose he opens a correspondence with the authorities. If one set of men have control, they will have nothing to do with it, whereas in those communities there may be thousands of people who as individuals would be very glad to get this labor and treat these people kindly and educate them. If another set of men be in power they will be afraid to do it, perhaps, on account of the opposition it will excite. I think all that is desired for the good of these colored people will be found in the first part of the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia, and this matter of correspondence ought to be abandoned.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the consent of the Senate to submit a motion that the Senate at half past four o'clock take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SUMNER. We had better pass this bill first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas desires the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit a motion in regard to a recess.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be received.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am somewhat unwell, and am compelled to leave the Senate. I have two or three little nominations for post offices and some business in my department in hand, and I will request the favor of a short executive session so as to dispose of them.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us pass this bill.

Mr. WILSON. It is very important to pass this bill to-day. I suggest to the Senator to place that business in the hands of some other Senator. I am sure there is no Senator but would be very glad to attend to it for him. I am aware of the condition of his health, but it is very important to get this bill out of the way before we adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will dispose of this bill before it does anything else; it has been pending a long time, and I really wish to get it off the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion of Mr. COLLAMER was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 24th instant, requesting information in regard to the alleged enlistment in foreign countries of recruits for the military and naval service of the United States, reports from the Secretaries of State, of War, and of the Navy, respectively, on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, correspondence between E. B. French, Second Auditor of the Treasury, and Henry W. De Puy, late agent of the Pawnee Indians, relative to a certain sum of money alleged to be due by the said De Puy to the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 558) to authorize the issuing of patents for certain lands in the town of Stockbridge, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 346) for the relief of Dr. Charles M. Wetherill, reported it without amendment.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 336) to amend the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GRIMES. As I presume there can be no objection to the bill, and it will lead to no discussion, I will ask that it be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that from and after the 1st day of July, 1864, the Washington Gas-Light Company shall not receive (exclusive of the excise tax collected for the United States) from consumers more than thirty-three and one third cents per hundred cubic feet of gas furnished by it, subject to a discount of not less than ten per cent. on all bills for gas, if paid at the office of the company within five days from their rendition, provided all arrears have been paid.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

And the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company are authorized to charge two cents for each transfer ticket on said road or its branches.

Mr. GRIMES. That will kill the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say one word in regard to this amendment. The charter of this road was amended by the House of Representatives so as to reduce its rate of fare. The Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate disagreed to it, thinking there was no occasion for the reduction; but in a committee of conference the reduction was agreed to, by which their fare is reduced to four cents. There was some testimony before the committee showing that these parties are subjected to some imposition in the transfer of passengers from the branch road to the main stem, and so vice versa; and at the solicitation of some friends who think the road has been unfairly dealt by I have offered this amendment.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I am satisfied this company is now making seventy-five per cent.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know what they are making, but I hope the amendment will not be put on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make a statement from the president of the road in regard to this subject. The Senator from Minnesota is greatly mistaken. The president of the road, who is a responsible man, Mr. Gideon, told me that he was willing to take his books before any committee and show that this story about exaggerated profits is totally unfounded. This company is required by its charter to carry passengers over both branches of the road for five cents. There is no such charter or no such law in the United States. It requires a street railroad to carry passengers so many miles for five cents, and then the Senate, without knowing precisely what was done, reduced the rate of fare to four cents. The president says he is able to prove to any intelligent man that it is utterly impossible to pay the expenses of transporting passengers at four cents. It seems to me, when we induce men to embark in a little enterprise of this kind, to reduce their fare from five to four cents, it is a class of legislation that I cannot characterize. I did not know anything about it at the time the conference report was made, and I believe I voted for it.

Mr. GRIMES. Our past legislation may have been all improper, but I think there is an impropriety in putting this amendment on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say also that the president stated that besides this twenty per cent. reduction on the gross receipts, they carried three thousand persons over branch roads without receiving anything for them, and they give to all the public employes passes. That is equivalent to about ten per cent. It seems to me that to legislate in this manner against a little railroad created by Congress is acting unfairly; and if we now have an opportunity to do them justice by allowing them to charge two cents for a transfer ticket, I think we ought to do it.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator is going to insist on his amendment I will tell him what Mr. Gideon told me.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do not go into the merits of it.

Mr. GRIMES. As Mr. Gideon has been heard on one side, we may as well have him on the other. Mr. Gideon confessed to me, and he confessed what was tantamount to that before the whole committee, that upon the amount of cash paid in of this stock, the company had divided thirty per cent.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better proceed with the order of the day. There is evidently a difference on this subject. It was said there would be no discussion upon it.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not suppose there would be.

Mr. SUMNER. If we can have a vote I have no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope we shall have a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed; and, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

RECESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall now resume the consideration of the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate at five o'clock take a recess until seven o'clock in the evening. ["Oh, no."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit the motion.

Mr. POWELL and others objected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope we shall.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes ten, noes not counted.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall now go on and finish the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. I hope there will be no objection to that, and then we shall be able to get through with this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I object. I hope we shall go on and sit now, if we are going to sit at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move to postpone all prior orders with the view to make the motion that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. FOOT. I presume there will be no objection to the consideration of the motion for a recess without postponing prior orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the motion, and the question now is on the motion that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. SPRAGUE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden,

Foot, Foster, Harlan, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Howe, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Van Winkle—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate accordingly took a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

CLAIMS FOR BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. HARLAN. There are two or three small bills that I have charge of, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, that will not occupy, I think, to exceed two or three minutes each, and I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to take them up and pass them. The first one is a bill (S. No. 228) providing for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the act to provide for satisfying claims for bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain, and for other purposes, approved July 27, 1842, and the two acts approved January 27, 1835, therein and thereby revived, and also the two acts to the same intent and purpose, respectively approved June 26, 1848, and February 8, 1854, shall be renewed and continued in force and effect, without restriction or limitation as to the time of location of the warrants issued in virtue of those acts.

The second section provides that all warrants for bounty lands heretofore issued in virtue of any of the several acts named, may be located at any time subsequent to the passage of this act, in conformity with the general laws in force at the time of such location; and all entries and locations heretofore made with such warrants are to be as valid and effectual as if those several acts had not expired at the time of such entry and location, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAS ORMIGAS AND LA NANA GRANTS.

Mr. HARLAN. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 205.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Las Ormigas and La Nana grants, in Louisiana. It provides in the case of all locations made with certificates issued under the act of Congress approved March 17, 1862, authorizing floats to issue in satisfaction of claims against the United States for lands sold by them within the Las Ormigas and La Nana grants, in the State of Louisiana, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause patents to issue for such locations, where the same may be found bona fide and satisfactory to him.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution with the view to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN. This bill will occupy but one or two minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. This resolution will not occupy more than two minutes. I shall object to the bill unless I get consent to offer my resolution now. I merely wish to have it read and referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to its being reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection does not carry it over. It has been taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for a division upon the question whether it shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not persist in stopping the action of the Senate. We can pass several bills now to which no objection can be made.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not disposed to be captious. I make a reasonable request, and if the Senators present will signify their disposition to grant me my request I shall make no objection to this or any other bill; but unless I am to receive that degree of courtesy and justice which every other Senator in this body can obtain I will impede the progress of business as much as I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection does not prevent the action of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. There is no quorum of the Senate present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That fact has not been ascertained.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky to allow this particular bill to pass. It is of no general interest, and has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS. I will withdraw the objection for the present; but as soon as this bill is disposed of I shall persist in offering my resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I was going to suggest to the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM YOCUM.

Mr. DAVIS. I now ask the permission of the Senate to introduce a resolution in relation to William Yocum, with a view to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and not to say a word about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky desires the unanimous consent of the Senate to present a resolution at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRIMES. Let the resolution be read at length, so that we may know what it is.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas William Yocum, a citizen of the United States and a resident of Cairo, in the State of Illinois, was on the — day of — convicted by a military commission of the United States of the offense of kidnapping and abducting an employe of the United States from the military service thereof; and whereas Lucien Anderson, Brutus J. Clay, William H. Randall, S. L. Casey, and Green Clay Smith afterwards presented their written petition to Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, asking him to pardon said William Yocum for said offense and his conviction of it and his sentence "to be confined at hard labor for the term of five years in the penitentiary at Albany, New York, or in such other place as the Secretary of War may direct;" and whereas the said Abraham Lincoln thereupon pardoned the said William Yocum and wrote the pardon on the back of the said petition in these words: "William Yocum, within named, is hereby pardoned."

"A. LINCOLN."

Therefore, Be it resolved, That the indorsement aforesaid by the President of the United States on the petition aforesaid, is a pardon of the said William Yocum from the conviction and sentence aforesaid, which entitles him to be discharged from further imprisonment thereunder.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator does not expect any action upon it at this session.

Mr. DAVIS. Not at all.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That four thousand copies of the internal revenue act last passed by Congress, with an index, to be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be printed for the use of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of persons employed as laundresses at the general hospitals of the United States in the city of Baltimore, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of B. B. French and Delphine P. Baker, in behalf of the National Literary Association, praying for an appropriation to aid in the support of a National Home for totally disabled soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 186) to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of Emerentiana Bowden, Sister Superior in charge of Saint Matthew's Academy in the city of Washington, praying for an appropriation for the purpose of laying the side footwalk on the north side of New York avenue between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets west; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

RICHARD G. MURPHY.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up House bill No. 162, which was reported this morning, and which will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy and Charles E. Flandreau. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nathaniel McLean the sum of $916 50; to Richard G. Murphy the sum of $1,700 32, and to Charles E. Flandreau the sum of $189 32, for additional pay for their services as agents for the Sioux of Minnesota during the respective periods when each served in that capacity after the treaty of July 23, 1851, with said Indians, until the 3d of March, 1857, at which last date the pay of that agency was raised by law to $1,500 per annum.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Richard G. Murphy, of Minnesota, formerly Indian agent, for services and expenses in the removal of Sioux Indians, in the year 1853, the sum of $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUCKALEW, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Richard G. Murphy."

RESERVATION OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) reserving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the present session granting lands or extending the time of former grants, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which provides that no act passed at the present session of Congress, granting lands to States or corporations, to aid in the construction of roads or for other purposes, or to extend the time of grants heretofore made, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases are reserved exclusively to the United States.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like this resolution to define exactly what are called mineral lands, otherwise it will make very great difficulty in our legislation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator asks why the Committee on Public Lands do not define what is meant by "mineral lands" in the sense in which it is used here. The committee favored this resolution as a practical measure. There have been no grants made this winter in which the reservation has inadvertently been omitted except upon a proposition making a grant of land in the region of Lake Superior, and there there are no minerals except copper and iron. It was thought best to except them from all grants made in that region of country.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

B. F. KENDALL.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up House bill No. 414, for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall, who was formerly superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory of Washington. While the Secretary is looking for it, I can state in a moment what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is whether the Senate will proceed to its consideration, and that question will be put when the Secretary has found the bill.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. While the Secretary is looking for that bill, I ask leave to make some reports from the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, have directed me to report them back without amendment and adversely:

A bill (S. No. 13) to amend an act entitled "An act to define and punish certain conspiracies," passed July 31, 1861, as also the twenty-fourth section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1863;

A bill (S. No. 29) to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 68) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a resolution to amend the first joint rule of the two Houses of Congress; a resolution relating to the revision of the United States statutes; and two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the creation of a new district court of the United States, to be held at the port of New York, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a bill (S. No. 304) in relation to the circuit courts of the United States, and a joint resolution (S. No. 26) proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, reported in favor of postponing their further consideration to the first Monday in December next; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred two petitions of citizens of the United States; a petition of the citizens of Pennsylvania; a memorial of the representatives of a mass convention of Christian people held in Alleghany city, Pennsylvania, on the 27th and 28th of January last; a petition of citizens and soldiers of the United States; and a memorial of a committee in behalf of the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in the United States, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will recognize the obligations of the Christian religion; also two resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; also a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt law; also a memorial of the members of the bar of the District of Columbia praying for an increase of the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; also a memorial of the United States district judges of the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and New Jersey, praying for an increase of their salaries; also a petition of citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying for the passage of a law declaratory of certain terms used in the Constitution of the United States; also a memorial of the German Radical Club of Philadelphia, a memorial of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, and a petition of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the plan of reconstruction of the Union proposed in the proclamation of the President of the United States; and also the petition of Jane P. Thurston, praying to be indemnified for alleged maladministration of the estate of her late husband, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

CONTINUATION OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask leave to offer a resolution in order to facilitate the public business. It is a resolution that has been drawn in conformity with the practice of former sessions:

Resolved, That all subjects before the Senate at the close of the present session, including those before committees, shall be continued to the next session, and shall then be proceeded with in the same manner as though no adjournment of the Senate had taken place; and the papers which have been referred to the committees and may be in their possession at the close of the session shall be returned informally to the Secretary and by him restored to the committees when appointed at the next session.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. McDUGALL. That resolution antagonizes with one that I was about to offer myself if I had had an opportunity of addressing the Chair and being permitted to introduce the resolution. By way of objection I will read the resolution which I hold in my hand, which is somewhat controversial with the proposition presented by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the answer from the Department of State to the Senate resolution No. 47, in relation to Mexican affairs, be printed for the use of the Senate.

I suppose I am at liberty to say a word upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is in order so long as it is confined to the subject in hand.

Mr. McDUGALL. I mean to confine myself to the subject in hand exactly, and oppose the proposition advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts. I shall try to bring myself within the common rules of order.

I take this occasion to say that on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] a resolution was passed in this Senate asking information from the State Department, as far as could be obtained, as to our relations with Mexico, the condition of Mexico, of Central America, and the South American republics, so far as we were concerned, and our relations and their relations with Europe. The resolution was passed by the one voice of the Senate. The inquiry simply was of an Executive Department of the Government to furnish us such information as was consistent with public policy. We received that information, which was placed upon the table of the Senate and by the Senate referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it has lain buried, not five fathoms deep, but certainly as well buried as if it had been put into the tombs of the Capulets. I have sought for this information. I asked for it. The Senator from Ohio asked for it in his place in the Senate Chamber. The Senate conceded it. The State Department has sent us this information. It has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and they hold it as their personal property, as if they were not mere agents of this senatorial body for a specific purpose; that is, to receive it and give it its proper order. When the Senate asks for a piece of information it is not to get a body of manuscript to be hid in one of the committee-rooms of this Senate, but it is asked for for the information of Senators and Representatives and the country. I am compelled to say, and it is my duty to say it, that several things sent to that same committee, of which I am an unworshipful member, have been held there against all the laws of parliamentary usage and against the right of every individual Senator.

What is the office of a committee? To receive the subject-matter referred to it and give the judgment of the committee upon that subject-matter to the Senate for its just, or it may be its unjust, judgment. This is not the only subject that has been buried in the vaults of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The chairman of that committee now asks for the passage of this resolution, and while I do not feel myself able to resist the tide of his power here in the Senate Chamber by the power of votes I have a right as a Senator to protest against such conduct as against parliamentary law, and against my rights individually as a Senator.

The most grave and important question that we have before the country, before the Senate and the House of Representatives, is our relations with the sister republic—I still call her such—on our southern border. The Senator from Ohio sought information upon it. The Senate gave him the privilege of informing himself and informing us. The information has been sent to us from the State Department. I have asked in humble language in the committee-room to which I belong that it might simply be published, that I might have the opportunity myself to read it, and that other Senators might have an opportunity to read it, and members of the House of Representatives might do it, that they might be wise in legislation. These opportunities have been denied by the policy festina lente, as understood by some; but whether he hastens slowly or hastens at all is a question in my mind. The information is needed for legislation. It is needed for general information. I need it. Every Senator upon this floor needs it.

The resolution now offered by the Senator involves the retaining in the committee-room down stairs of a public document sent here from the State Department under our orders for public information. The Senator says now that the publication of these things, and other questions of equally grave import, should be postponed until the next session of Congress. For myself, I am not so wise as not to need instruction, and I cannot find the full measure of instruction upon this floor upon questions foreign to our immediate business. I cannot find the full measure of instruction here as to our relations with Mexico, which is admitted to be a grave question to this Republic; at least it was thought in the Baltimore convention that it was a grave question. It was thought so in 1824 under President Monroe; it was thought so subsequently under President Adams; it has been thought so also by the American people; and, as I have remarked, it has been thought so lately by the Republican convention that met at Baltimore. To understand exactly all these relations, what we have done, what is being done, and what shall be done with regard to the American States outside of the old Union, is a matter of grave import.

As this resolution is now before us, I believe I have the privilege of offering an amendment to it, and by way of testing the sense of the Senate, I will move to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved" and to insert—

That the answer from the Department of State to the Senate resolution No. 47, in relation to Mexican affairs, be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am surprised by the question that has been raised by the Senator from California. The resolution that I have offered to-night has been one rather of form, belonging to the order of business, and according to the usage of the Senate. It was prepared at my request by one of the gentlemen who are habitually seated at the desk in conformity with the precedents of this body, and its object was simply to facilitate public business at the close of the session. It was not, so far as I was concerned, pointed in any respect at any particular pending measure. Its object was to facilitate the transaction of all the business of the body. The Senator now interposes a proposition as a substitute which is pointed at any particular pending measure. He proposes that the Senate should intervene and should summarily direct the publication of an important series of papers now at this moment on the table of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and with regard to which they have as yet come to no definite conclusion. The Senator knows very well that those papers have been under consideration at least at two different sittings of the committee. He knows also that the committee has been positively convened to meet to-morrow partly to consider what should be done with regard to those very papers.

Mr. McDUGALL. I was not aware of it. I was at the committee-room at its last meeting I think as early as any other member except the chairman. I remained there for some time. I was there long after eleven o'clock. I did not hear any proposition to take the subject up again as a question for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I had supposed the Senator must have received a notice at his desk this afternoon that there would be a meeting of the committee to-morrow morning at ten o'clock. Certainly I ordered one.

Mr. DAVIS. I received one.

Mr. FOSTER. I also received one.

Mr. SUMNER. Here are two Senators who have received notice.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not question your veracity at all, but I did not hear it. I know that I urged the question upon the committee, which was simply a question of printing what had been sent to us from the State Department and the committee declined acting upon it, which I took to be, as I have found it on other occasions, a positive negative.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator hardly does justice to the committee; but still I do not wish to go into any statement of the course of the committee.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADE. I believe I offered the resolution that called out these papers. I did not know until lately that the answer had come in. It was in my absence, or at least it did not come to my notice, or I should have moved and endeavored to have those papers printed, and I am very glad to hear that they will probably be printed.

Mr. McDUGALL. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a statement while it is in my mind. I took occasion to say to the committee this morning—and therefore it is no breach of the etiquette of the committee-room—that I should feel it my duty to call attention to the matter on the floor of the Senate. There is, therefore, no violation of the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I presume those papers will now come to light and be printed. I called them out for the purpose of information, for myself at all events, whether anybody else wanted them or not, and I hope they will not be lost entirely in that committee-room. I do not suppose they will be. I presume they will be reported back and printed.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to say in all frankness to my friend, he can be assured that they will not be lost, if, in the opinion of the committee, after the best attention they are able to give to them, they seem, all things considered, proper to be published at this time, and with reference also to considerations of economy. They are a very large mass of papers. If published they would occupy two large volumes; and one question that has presented itself to the committee on the threshold was, whether upon the whole at this time it was expedient to enter upon the publication of so large a mass of correspondence as that, with regard to which we had no very clear idea. I have given such attention as I could to the correspondence since it has been laid before the committee. Indeed I occupied the chief part of the time of our recesses in my committee-room perusing that correspondence. It is very extensive, and it is not easy to take its whole character in the limited opportunities that I have had.

Mr. GRIMES. Why is it not here?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asks, why is it not here? Because we did not suppose it ought to be published.

Mr. McDUGALL. The Secretary of State advised that it might be published.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have had no advice from the Secretary on the subject.

Mr. McDUGALL. You had a talk with the Secretary on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Secretary never gave me any advice on the subject; I never asked his advice on the subject.

Mr. McDUGALL. Did you not say so in the committee-room?

Mr. SUMNER. I never intended to say any such thing. The whole question is still pending before the committee, and awaits their action. What they may say with regard to it, whether on grounds of economy or on grounds of policy it will be expedient to publish that correspondence or not, remains to be seen.

Mr. WADE. I am not entirely satisfied with that explanation of the matter. When I called these papers out from the Executive, I intended myself to have the privilege of looking them over, and I did not expect that I should be compelled to submit entirely to the judgment of any committee; but if I had to submit the question whether these documents should be printed to any committee, it would be the Committee on Printing, and not the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator has told us very truly that the Committee on Foreign Relations are so much occupied with important business that they have not time to look into these voluminous documents and ascertain whether the matter contained in them ought to be printed or not, and consequently the Senate has not intrusted them with jurisdiction over that question. I suppose they ought to go to the Committee on Printing, and let them judge whether their importance entitles them to be published. I do not think that any committee have a right to investigate these public documents that are called out by a Senator and at their election suppress them altogether, so that he who calls for them shall never see them if the committee shall think they are not proper for publication. I think that is a great extent of jurisdiction in the committee. I do not think they are intrusted with that question at all. I think the papers ought to be handed back to the Senate. Perhaps it would be proper, as these are executive documents, for the committee to look into them far enough to see whether it would be best that they should be printed in confidence for the Senate in executive session; but I do not believe that that committee have such entire jurisdiction over this subject that if they think these documents are not proper for publication, I, who called them out, am not to see them. I want to have something to say about that. It may be that their judgment is very good, but I am not entirely satisfied with an implicit confidence in any committee. I want to see the documents myself.

Mr. SUMNER. This voluminous mass of correspondence was received some time last week. I think the committee has made reasonable haste with regard to it, and the whole question will be before the committee again to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

B. F. KENDALL.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to call up House bill No. 414, for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall go on with the order of the day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had the floor half an hour ago, and made this motion, and yielded to gentlemen simply because the Clerk, in a mistake, could not find the bill. It will take but a moment to consider the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I move to postpone all prior orders, with a view to take up the bill I have indicated.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to that motion and shall vote against it. I desire to take up House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the several States. In other words, I wish to kill the Camden and Amboy railroad monopoly, and I want it taken up now. I desire to antagonize that to the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us finish the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that the question be put on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before these gentlemen came in I had the floor and moved to take up the bill I have indicated, and it was passed over informally, and all this discussion about Mexico has intervened. I ask the Senate to take it up now. It will take but a moment to dispose of it.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall not take it up and thus put aside the order of the evening.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it be laid aside informally. I wish to have this bill disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not finish the order of the day?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Why not dispose of this, which will take but a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the objection is withdrawn. I hope the special order will be passed over informally.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to its being passed over informally.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 414) for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of B. F. Kendall, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, the sum of $2,108 30, being the amount shown to have been disbursed by him in his lifetime, and for which no vouchers were to be found.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state that this bill makes no appropriation out of the Treasury. Mr. Kendall was killed, shot in his office, and on his person were found memorandums in his handwriting, and the agent and his administrator have appeared before the committee and stated to them that this amount of money was paid out by him; but no voucher was found in his possession. He died in that way, and the administrator wants to settle the account. The administrator has closed every other item of the account but this, and he has paid over to his successor nearly six thousand dollars in cash. There is no doubt that it is just, and the bill should pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 549) further to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I call for the order of the day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the several States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is before the Senate, but the Senator from Michigan moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me finish my bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will give way and let me take up this bill. It is very short.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot. I am for that bill of the Senator from Michigan, but I desire to dispose of the bill now before us.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my motion. The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKALEW. A portion of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia was stricken out. That portion, as I understand, was what related to correspondence with the Governors and municipal authorities of the States.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator is in error about the motion to strike out. The vote was a tie and therefore the motion failed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There was a motion to strike out the whole of the amendment, which failed by a tie vote of 14 to 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that a motion to strike out a portion of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I was correct in my recollection.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to have it read as it now stands, so that the Senate may understand it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the said Commissioner cannot find abandoned real estate on which to employ all of the freedmen who may come under his care and control by virtue of this act, it shall be his duty, so far as may be practicable, to provide for them homes and employment with humane and suitable masters at fair and just compensation for their services.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That portion of the amendment which remains contains the substance of the whole. The portion struck out was unimportant, in my opinion, so far as substance is concerned, because, under the clause as it will now stand if adopted, the very correspondence contemplated in the portion that has been stricken out may be carried on by these officers, and the very same things may be done by them which could have been done or would have been done under the proposition as it stood in its original form. I desire to call attention to this point distinctly, that it may be understood, if we pass this bill in the form in which it stands, that we are now indorsing the substance of the whole proposition of the Senator from West Virginia, involving all the characteristics which I endeavored to describe in my remarks in the session of to-day. If it be in order I desire now to submit a motion that so much of the amendment as remains in the bill be stricken from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that motion is not in order, the Senate having refused to strike it all out.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The motion to strike out the whole of the matter failed. Subsequently a motion to strike out a part of it prevailed. I had some doubt in my own mind with regard to the regularity of a motion to strike out the remaining portion of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. In that case what I have to observe is this: the bill standing in this form with the retention of this objectionable matter ought not, in my opinion, to be sanctioned by gentlemen on either side of the Chamber, those who are in favor of the bill as it originally stood as well as those who were opposed to the proposition in the form in which it was embodied by the committee. I think we should reject the bill in its present form, or reconsider that portion of it.

The amendment was in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to say something in opposition to this bill being ordered to a third reading.

Mr. President, the first passing political event of which I read was the burning of Moscow, and I have lived until a great Republic is about to fall into ruins. This great Republic had its origin, its birth in the principle of liberty asserted by the white man, the Caucasian race. To escape from European tyranny, our ancestors fled to a new world and founded their homes, their country, and their Government in a wilderness. Some considerable time after the infant colonies had been founded what is called the African slave trade sprung up, and our mother country, England, and all of her colonies of the New World entered into that trade and imported African slaves into their respective countries, the mother-land as well as the colonies.

Among the earliest colonies to enter upon this trade and to introduce this servile population of a distinct race into their midst was the colony of Massachusetts. The first example of a fugitive slave law that I have ever seen in my life was passed by her for the government of her own slaves. The earliest, the most complete and rigid slave code that I have ever read was passed by that State. She, and the traders and shippers of other New England colonies, entered early and extensively into this slave trade. They brought the sable sons of Africa from the homes of their fathers into their States, and much more largely into the southern States, where their labor was more necessary and profitable than it was in the barren soil and the rigid climate of the North, and sold them to southern planters for gold. At the dawn of the troubles between the mother country and the colonies, every one of the thirteen colonies was slaveholding. They all recognized the African slaves as property. They had laws regulating the transfer of that property by sale, by devise, by descent. African slaves were as much the subject of contract and of the transactions of all the societies of the thirteen colonies as any other species of property.

The troubles with the mother country commenced, not by reason of any conflict with the rights of the negro, not by reason of any infringement upon his liberties or upon his inalienable right to freedom, but wholly irrespective of the slave, of his condition, and of his destiny, exclusively in consequence of aggressions upon the white man and with a view to assert the rights and the liberties of the white man alone, ignoring and not paying the least regard to the condition and rights and liberties of the slave.

Before the Articles of Confederation were formed a sort of revolutionary government was first agreed upon by the colonists. The parties to that preliminary government were the white colonists acting in their respective colonies. It was made for the purpose of vindicating the colonists from the burdens and the effects of the legislation of the imperial Parliament in imposing excise and stamp duties and other measures. That first government existed about two years, and was then superseded by what were called the Articles of Confederation. They were proposed, according to my recollection, in 1774 or 1775, I am not certain which, and about three years after, some time in the year 1777, they were agreed to by the thirteen colonies.

The colonies entered into that struggle for independence; they entered into that struggle for personal liberty; they entered into that struggle for the assertion of the great principle that taxation and representation were correlatives; they entered upon the struggle to vindicate their immunity from the burdens of taxation imposed upon them by the mother country and its Parliament while they were deprived of the privilege and the right of representation. The war then commenced upon the basis and for the assertion of the rights of the white man exclusively, as I have related, and the negro, in the whole of the contest, was as much ignored and as entirely exempt from it, from the causes that produced it, from its events, and from its consequences and fruits, as though he had been in Africa.

Mr. WILKINSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; but upon this condition, that I shall answer no other question.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senator states that during the Revolution the negroes were entirely ignored; that they were thrown out of the question entirely. I want to ask him if General Washington did not call upon the State of Rhode Island to furnish negroes in the battles of the Revolution?

Mr. DAVIS. I admit that he did; but I deny that it was for the assertion of a solitary right of the negro that that struggle commenced. I deny that the success of that struggle in a military or a political point of view inured to the benefit of a solitary negro, or to the liberation of one from slavery.

But, Mr. President, I will proceed with my narrative. This struggle lasted for seven years, nine months, and one day; and during the whole of that time, in all of its features, in all of its fruits, and in its final consummation, it was a struggle for the white man, for his own rights and liberties against the oppressions of the mother country, and in no sense and in no effect, neither in theory nor practice, was it a struggle or a contest for the rights of the negro. These thirteen colonies, every one of them then holding to slavery, united as slave colonies against the common oppression of the mother country.

For something like two years they carried on the war as colonists, seeking simply a redress of their wrongs, and with a purpose of returning to the mother country. But, sir, the policy of George III and Lord North was the policy of Abraham Lincoln toward these southern States. They assumed the position, and held it inflexibly for about six years of the war, that they would offer no terms of conciliation; they would accept no propositions of compromise; they would have submission and subjugation—nothing else, and nothing short of it.

In 1781 the King of England sent his speech to Parliament, and, in response to that speech, Parliament, by its address, adopted sentiments responsive to the determination of George III and of Lord North to subjugate the colonists, by a majority of ninety-seven votes. About six months afterwards General Conway, who had steadily opposed the war of the mother country for the subjugation of the colonies, proposed a resolution condemning the further prosecution of the war, and insisting upon peace with the colonists. Upon a division, that resolution was carried by a majority of ten or twelve. In obedience to that changed sentiment of Parliament and of the people of England George III sent a communication to Parliament that favored peace; that breathed the spirit of peace and of the recognition of the independence of the colonists; and upon the motion of the same General Conway an address responsive to that address, to its purpose and to its pacific spirit, and thanking the king for his change of sentiment in relation to the colonists, passed the House of Commons without a division. I have read recently the letters from George III to Lord North, or extracts from them. They may be found in one of Brougham's sketches, and they may be read with much profit and instruction by the men of our day.

The perfect similarity of sentiment and of policy between George III and his ministry, and especially Lord North, toward the colonists, and that of Abraham Lincoln and his Cabinet toward the southern States, runs a parallel on all fours. There was this difference between Abraham Lincoln and George III: both were weak men; both obstinate men; but the one was entirely honest and sincere in his purposes; the other was of an opposite character: Lincoln flexible, but still obstinate, enthroned now a monarch at the other end of the avenue, almost as much so as Louis Napoleon, and wielding the power that was constructed by the fathers of our country for George Washington.

Sir, the United States now is in the condition of Sinbad the sailor, and here is Abraham Lincoln the old man of the sea. He has persuaded Sinbad the sailor to take him upon his shoulders, and his long legs are wound around the neck of Sinbad. He is making Sinbad trot him off from day to day and from year to year, never relaxing his grip; and this old man of the sea is now trying to persuade Sinbad the sailor to let him hold his seat for another term. But, sir, Sinbad the sailor got a stimulant which he administered to the old man of the sea that intoxicated and enervated him and relaxed his nerves, and he fell from his seat. Our old man of the sea has his stimulant, the stimulant of a weak intellect, of inordinate vanity, of the delusion that he is a great man and a great statesman, and that he knows more about the public sentiment and the public business of the people of America than any living man; and under this excited vanity and the delusions which it has produced, he is cutting high fantastic tricks before the people of America that will impel them to the performance of the same office that Sinbad performed: they will hurl this old man of the sea from their shoulders and their necks.

But, Mr. President, the war of the Revolution preceded. There never was a question made in relation to the slaves, and for this, among other reasons, that every colony held to slaves, every colony by its laws admitted property in slaves, and every colony had laws and regulations for the better control and government of that property.

Our independence was acknowledged at length in 1783—not the independence of the negro, not the freedom of the negro, not the right of the negro to self-government, not the partnership of the negro with the white man in the independence and liberty and self-government for which our fathers had waged this long and arduous and bloody contest. The negro was ignored. He was no party to the transaction. All of its struggles, all of its privations, all of its fruits were for the white man, and not for the negro. When independence was declared all the colonies were slaveholding as they had been at the dawn of the struggle. In 1780 Massachusetts formed her State constitution, and afterwards, about 1783, her courts declared that one of the provisions of that constitution abolished slavery.

But, sir, the old Articles of Confederation formed a feeble Government. They were incapable to hold together and to govern, as a free people should be governed, the thirteen colonies; and when the bonds of their union seemed to be falling to pieces, and the colonies were about to be resolved into their original elements, some of the wise and great men of the nation conceived the idea of forming a new Government and a more perfect Union. They got together, and they sent the wise and the great men of the Revolution, the most virtuous and the wisest men that ever adorned humanity, to reform their Government and establish a more perfect Union to secure the blessings of liberty to them and to their posterity forever. Who were they? The people of the United States—the white men. The negro was not represented in the Convention of 1787. He had no voice in the formation of that Government and in laying out its great and immortal principles. Its rights, its liberties, its investment and restrictions of power were not by him or for him. They were by the Caucasian race, and for the Caucasian race alone.

Gentlemen have relied upon the effect of the Declaration of Independence. It has been said a thousand times and truly that the Declaration of Independence did not comprehend the negro. It did not relate to him. When it spoke of the equality of men it meant the white man and not the negro. The consequence was that the Declaration of Independence never ameliorated the condition of the negro, much less discharged one from slavery and thralldom. It never added one iota to his rights or liberties. He was not thought of as a subject of that Declaration of Independence or of the Government which was formed in 1787 any more than the wild Indian of the forest. He was no more a party to our political partnership of Union and of Government than the Indian. He had nothing to do with it. Its language, its voice, its sentiments, its principles related not to him but to the white man alone. The same is true of the Constitution. When the Constitution was formed it was made by white men and it was made for white men alone. The negro had nothing to do with it, no more than the Indian of the forest, or even the beast of the field. He had no agency, no power, no influence directly or indirectly in its formation.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely want to remind the Senator of a historical fact which has evidently escaped him. At the close of the revolutionary war an address was put forth from the Continental Congress to the world written by James Madison which contains this very striking and important passage. It says that the people are never to forget that in the war that has now closed the rights for which they contended were the rights of human nature.

Mr. DAVIS. And what did he mean by "human nature?"

Mr. WILKINSON. White human nature. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; he meant the white man, and nothing else but the white man. Is not that proved by the result? Is not that proved by the event? Is not that proved by the consequences that ensued in the Revolution? Was it made for the Indian? How did that ameliorate the condition of the Indian? How did it affect the Indians of the forest who were then more numerous than the negroes within the limits of the United States? How did that make him a party to our political Government? How did it invest him with any citizenship, with any political power, with any rights under the Government? How did it make him a party to the Government? Not at all; nor did it make the negro any more a party or a subject or a beneficiary of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution than it did the Indian, and not so much so.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who is deeply read in history and especially in our revolutionary history, knows this fact full well, as every man does: that a proposition in that Convention to admit negroes into our political partnership, to make them parties to our Government, and to give them freedom and liberty and rights under the Constitution, would have scattered that Convention of wise men engaged in the great business of forming a new Government, and they never would have formed any Government at all. Why, sir, there was a revolutionary war of upwards of seven years, desolating the thirteen colonies; there were three distinct forms of government made for the purpose of securing the fruits of that Revolution and the liberties for which the war was waged; and the negro was never heard of in the whole of this varied drama; never himself in person or by his representative seen or heard in any of the councils, civil or military. There was not a single article or provision of either of these Governments referring to him, touching or affecting him. He never received a right, much less his liberty under all or either of them. And in view of all this, for gentlemen to get up and contend that the negro is embraced by these great and solemn transactions that were conducted by the Caucasian race alone in the fulfillment of their own destiny and to secure their own rights, is one of the most absurd positions I think that well read and sensible men could ever give their consent to. I repeat that if there had been any movement in the Convention to make the negro a party to our Government, or to give him any of the rights and privileges and liberties which it secured to the white man, there would have been no Government formed, and every intelligent man knows it.

We moved along, e pluribus unum, the United States of America, in a grand and glorious destiny, that destiny controlled by the white man, and the object of the machinery by which that destiny was upheld and controlled being for the white man alone, and not the negro or the Indian. The last people, as I have said before so often, that gave up the slave trade after the formation of the Constitution were the people of Massachusetts, and they extended the time for importing slaves into the United States for twenty years. They availed themselves of the privilege of trafficking in that property all the time, and some of their illicit traders still prosecuted the trade after the law which had been previously passed took effect in 1808.

Mr. President, I have read with emotions of patriotism, of glowing pride and sentiment that I have no language to describe, the development of our nation, of our people, the aggregation of our numbers, our wealth, our power, and our grandeur as long as its great and fundamental principles were observed by the different States and parties to the Government. What was one of those principles? It was this, and it is the very corner-stone upon which this imperial republican Government was reared, that each State should have the exclusive control and management of its own domestic affairs.

We have been told thousands of times that slave States and free States could not exist under the same Government, that there was a principle of antagonism and of mutual aggressions that rendered it impossible. Sir, from about the year 1640 up to the year 1830 these colonies first, and then States, existed together in harmony for a large portion of the time under that blended system, and there was no disturbance among them; there was no cause of quarrel; the fraternity of the States was never disturbed; and why? Because all the States acknowledged and acted upon practically the great corner principle of our Government, that each State was to regulate its own domestic concerns. But, sir, in an evil hour the men who had been deprived of the right of importing slaves any longer into the United States and selling them to the South, turned upon their own principles, their own laws, their own practices, the institution of slavery which they had aided the South to build up. After selling those slaves to the South for gold and lucre they wanted, in violation of the Federal Constitution and of the State constitutions and laws, to deprive the purchasers of this property which they had sold to them, without making compensation for it.

Mr. President, I have traced this history for the purpose of deducing one great practical conclusion from it. The thirteen colonies were comparatively a small country to what the great Republic embraced at the commencement of our present troubles. We acquired Louisiana from France. A northern navigator in the enterprise of his native coasted along the Pacific coast and entered the mouth of the Columbia river. Afterwards the post of Astoria was established, and by discovery and settlement our country acquired the vast Pacific slope, whose mineral wealth now knows no calculation. After that we acquired Florida by treaty, adding another vast country to our already grand and augmenting territory. After that we undertook to filibuster for Texas, and a war was commenced, as I then believed and as I still believe, by the then President of the United States against the Constitution, in defiance of the power of Congress, while that body was in session. He proclaimed in his message that American blood had been shed upon American soil; but the contrary of the proposition was true: Mexican blood was shed upon Mexican soil by the American soldiery; for that portion of what was then called Texas was never any part of the province of Texas while it was a Spanish province. I denounced that war in the other end of the Capitol in terms as bold, and, if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] were here, I would say as violent and denunciatory as I have denounced the measures and usurpations of power on the part of this Administration. I never was called in question for that free and manly expression of disapprobation of the measures of the party and the President then in power. There were other men who denounced them in as free and in as unequalled terms as I did; and no man ever dared then to arraign, to denounce, or to attempt by threats and intimidation to awe the freedom of debate either with myself or with any other person.

Why, sir, how was it in the revolutionary war? Read the thundering and eloquent philippics of the elder Chatham, of Fox, of Burke, and others in the British Parliament against the iniquity and the oppressiveness of the course of the Government of the mother country toward the colonies. There is there a boldness, a manliness, a freedom of condemnation, and a lofty strain of eloquence and invective that no speakers of this day can reach, either in power of oratory, in manliness of just rebuke, or even in the bitterness of invective. If the speeches that were enunciated by those men, whose opposition to the tyrannical policy of George III and Lord North has given them a history before which even Grecian and Roman eloquence pales, and made the age in which they lived and spoke renowned for the height and depth and power of its oratory—if these very sentiments had been expressed in this Chamber against the violations of the Constitution, the usurpations of power, and the unjust and iniquitous measures of this Administration, a tool of power would have sprung to his feet and offered resolutions for the expulsion of those who uttered them.

Why, sir, toward the close of the American war there was a resolution introduced into Parliament thanking Sir Henry Clinton and Sir Guy Carleton, two of the most renowned leaders in the British army, for their eminent military services in their efforts to reduce the colonies to obedience. What did these great men of the Opposition do; these lights of liberty and of human rights; these bold geniuses who were the noblest and truest and most efficient sentinels on the towers of human liberty that have ever graced humanity? They opposed the resolution of thanks upon the ground, expressed in glowing eloquence of invective and denunciation, that they would not thank men who had engaged in an oppressive and unjust war in murdering the colonists of England. I might be impelled possibly to use the same language in regard to the present war, but if I were, every consideration of prudence for safety in my seat here would restrain me. Sir, if I were to use the same language in my place in this Chamber which I hold under a free Constitution, with the freedom of speech expressly guaranteed to me by a provision of that Constitution, and which has been exercised so liberally, licentiously, and flagrantly by the men who are now denouncing its exercise, or by their fathers, I am certain I should lose my seat.

Sir, if the same principle and measure of justice that has been attempted to be meted out to men in the Opposition here had been practiced in the eastern States during the war of 1812 one half of Massachusetts would have been condemned and executed, or punished as disloyal. And what would have been the fate of hundreds and thousands of others of active Federalists, not only in New England, but scattered all over the United States, in Baltimore—Hansard, Williams, Linden, and others—who had fought and suffered in the revolutionary war, but who denounced the Administration and the war of 1812 with a vehemence and with an intensity of language and of passion that I never could approximate? What would have become of your Ouses, your Strongs, your Chittendens, and the other men who opposed this war? Sir, you may get their speeches and their writings and contrast them with the speeches and writings of this day against the usurpations of our Administration which is threatening the utter and final overthrow of our constitutional liberties, and they far transcend them in violence, in ability, and in fierceness of invective. Why, sir, was not the war against Mexico condemned with the same freedom, with as much passion, with as unsparing invective by all who opposed the war as the administration and usurpations of Abraham Lincoln are now condemned? Certainly.

But, Mr. President, this is the practical lesson to which these remarks tend, or to which at least I contemplated they should tend. The young giant of the West, the great Republic not only of this generation but of all the ages of the world, felt his power, and like any power that is felt it made the possessor who was conscious of its possession and exercise insolent. We recollect that some score of years or something like that period of time, Charles X, a Bourbon, was driven from the throne of France. He was the successor of Louis XIII and Louis XIV. He was the hereditary monarch of an absolute Government; that is to say, he was a branch of the then reigning family, and he succeeded, in truth, Louis XVIII. For less of despotic power, for less of abusive authority, for less of arbitrary and oppressive acts than the present President of the United States and his administration have perpetrated under our free and limited Constitution that monarch, Charles X, was driven from his throne by his subjects, on whose necks the yoke had sat from the time of Clovis and Charlemagne.

Under his rule, if I recollect aright, the Government of the United States had set up claims against that of France for spoiliations upon our commerce, and a treaty of peace had been made by which the Government of France undertook to pay to the United States for the benefit of her citizens whose commerce and property had been despoiled by the French cruisers $5,000,000. But Charles X was deposed and Louis Philippe ascended the throne in his stead, and when he ascended the throne he or his ministry made hesitancy and rather refused to pay the debt which the French Government under his predecessor had agreed to pay the United States. Old Hickory, the lion of the Hermitage, was then President, and his majestic roar was heard resounding through our land and across the sea even in the palace and recesses of the Tuilleries. He threatened war against France unless this stipulated sum in five installments, I believe, was paid by the French Government. It was a maxim of the old hero, as he said, that he never contended for anything that was not right and never submitted to anything that was wrong. The effect of the warlike position which he assumed, of his great force of character, of the military reputation which he had won during the war of 1812, and the mighty power of the young giant of the West toward France into submission and obedience to her covenant, and the money was paid.

After a while the Powers of Europe threatened to intervene in relation to Cuba. They wanted to take Cuba under their pupillage, to be sort of special guardians, as this bill proposes to create special guardians for the freedmen, as they are called. Our Presidents frowned upon that intervention of the Powers of Europe. Previous to that, however, when the allies had put down the greatest military conqueror of earth, and had bound him like an imperial eagle upon the rock of St. Helena, and the French army, under the Duke de Angouleme, marched into Spain and reinstated Ferdinand VII upon his throne, the allies of Leybach and Vienna, the Holy Alliance of Europe, threatened to intervene in the affairs of the nations of the continent for the purpose of staying the march and establishment of free principles. They threw out some feelers to George Canning, who was then the British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and he wrote a dispatch to the Foreign Minister of the Spanish Government, in which he entered his caveat against any such interference with the recently established independence of the South American Governments. Mr. Canning was an able statesman, devoted to a free monarchical Government against the aggressive tyranny of the Holy Alliance. He immediately opened a correspondence with the American Government; and James Monroe, a patriot and a soldier of the Revolution, whose blood was shed in that sacred cause, in a message which he sent to the Congress of the United States, declared what has since been proudly claimed by every free-hearted American as the Monroe doctrine, the chief principle of which was that this continent would no longer be held to be open for the establishment of colonies from the European Powers.

After a while came on the British intermeddling with the Mosquito coast, as it was called, and the island of Ruatan. England was trying to take under her protection and guardianship a breechless negro barbarian on the coast of Ruatan and to claim that negro barbarian, as her protégé, and that she was bound by treaty to this naked negro savage to hold him in his dominion and in his power. But our Government interposed in such terms as to induce the haughty mistress of the seas to relax her hold and to let go of the Mosquito king.

In a little while came along the dispute about a town on Vancouver's island called San Juan. The line of forty-nine degrees intersected that island and cut off a section of it that was left to the south, the greater portion of it being to the north. England claimed the whole of that island. She claimed that her line across Tuca straits struck that large island of Vancouver and ran along its sinuous coast a military league from the shore, and gave her the ownership of the whole island. One of our Presidents dispatched a military and naval expedition, which took possession of the territory that of right and by treaty belonged to us.

The manner in which we thus displayed our power and made England, Spain, and all the Powers of Europe respect and acknowledge and concede our rights, excited their envy, their apprehensions, and their fears for our growing strength and power. They reasoned thus: if the young and infant Republic, while even in its swaddling-clothes, can display the courage and power and resources that carried it through the Mexican war in such rapid triumph, ending in such a blaze of glory under the lead of one of the greatest military captains of his age, what have we to expect from its power and its spirit of aggression when it becomes of mature years? Sir, the French and especially the English statesmen are wise; they have a long forecast; they are always true to interest. The guiding star, the light that blazes upon the path of England on land and on ocean is her self-interest. Sir, we did hector over that Power, we did it over Austria also. The exploit of Lieutenant Ingraham in the Bay of Smyrna where he cleared his frigate for battle and compelled the captain of the Austrian craft to surrender Kosztia, who had only taken the preliminary oath to become a citizen of the United States, admonished even the leaden despot of Austria in the very midst of Europe of the danger that even so remote and sequestered a Power as Austria had to expect from us.

It then became the object and the policy of all Europe, in obedience to their envy, their fears, and their jealousy of our power, to watch its growth and development, and to sear that power whenever and wherever they could. We were an offshoot from England. We spoke her language. We had her great principles of liberty and of civil jurisprudence. She was almost as familiar with our history and our institutions, and looked forward to our destiny with as clear a vision, as the most sagacious statesman of America. She saw that in a few years she would lose the trident of the seas; that Britannia would no longer rule the waves. Our mercantile marine had already grown to and surpassed her own gigantic commercial marine; and it was only necessary to apply our vast resources to make our military marine as great and greater than the Power who claimed to have more ships of war than all the world beside. She knew that the growth and development of population and riches and power in the United States could not be safely endured for her; that by some act or policy or strategy it must be checked, else she, by the side of this gigantic and colossal young Republic of the New World, would be dwarfed into an insignificant Power of the earth.

She looked at our institutions. She saw the one fatal source of discord, of division, of dismemberment of this imperial Republic, and that point of discord was the slave subject. She saw the fanaticism and hypocrisy of the people of the North in relation to the slave institution which they had themselves built up. She saw that avarice, and pride, and fanaticism, and false philanthropy, and every other vicious and delusive motive of action of the human heart could be enlisted and frenzied in favor of the abolition of slavery. On the other hand, she saw that the value of the southern States depended upon the continuance of that institution and of that labor; that the southern owners of rice and cotton and sugar fields, if deprived of their slaves, would feel that they had lost their heritage and no longer had a possession.

As Eve opened to earth the fatal apple of discord, so the sagacious and far-seeing statesmen of England who understood so well the human heart and all its motives of action looked forward to this question as the fatal rock upon which by her management and guidance our great ship of State might be made to strike and forever sink in the depths of an unfathomable ocean.

The honorable Senator who has brought forward this measure and so many cognate measures at this session, a man of ability, of learning, of high traits and attractions as a gentleman, visited England under the prestige of persecution, and cruel and brutal persecution, from the South. His case had gone before him across the water; it was read by the reading public of England. They received him sympathetically, with open hearts and open arms; they caressed him; they gave him their attention and their hospitality; they indoctrinated him, (because I learn that he never was an abolitionist till 1846,) though from entirely different motives and considerations, with deep, implacable, obdurate, unappeasable hostility to slavery. The war that you, Mr. President, and your associates have waged against the Constitution, infringing the rights of the people of another section, has been fanned and impelled and exasperated and energized by the machinations of English statesmen and English politicians, and all with the great, cardinal, main object of dissolving the Union on that fatal sectional rock. You, sir, are as much responsible for this as any living man. If the Crittenden compromise resolutions had been accepted by you and your associates this civil war would never have occurred, this disruption of our Union never would have taken place. If the previous agitation of the slave subject, if the previous infringement and aggressions upon the rights of slaveholders by the people of the North had never taken place, we should not be in this lowering and dark day when our liberties and all the hopes of the world in free government seem about to founder. If you had practiced the same forbearance in relation to slavery in the southern States that you did in relation to slavery in Cuba and Brazil; if you had not meddled yourselves with the subject; if you had ceased to read about it, to talk about it, to lecture about it, to sermonize about it, to excite and madden ignorance, passion, and frenzy about it; if you had performed this office of forbearance and fraternity and constitutional duty, this terrible day would never have come upon the country.

But, sir, England knew the Puritan race; it had originated with her; we know the Puritan race here. It has some of the highest properties that belong to any family or class of men; but it will not let other people's business alone. It had agreed that the States should be the exclusive managers and have the exclusive control of all their domestic institutions and affairs. All that was asked was that it should practice upon that great and fundamental principle of the Constitution; but England impelled and spurred it forward to submit to no such thing; and why? England knew that in proportion as this question was raised, as it aggregated, as it grew in strength and occupied the hearts and the souls of the people South and North, it would as a subject of discord, of division, of disruption, become resistless in its force and certainly produce that dissolution of the Union which she desired as the greatest of all results.

I admit that many men in England are opposed to slavery. The British Government liberated the slaves in the British West India islands. They were not liberated by their owners; they were liberated by men who had no interest in or ownership of them. Whenever slaves' labor can be employed profitably to their owners, the owners will not liberate them. It is because men have the power to liberate and no interest in the continuation of the institution that slaves are liberated. The history of the world proves that. I admit that Bright and some of the Quaker philanthropists of England, in obedience to the tenets and principles and traditions of their order, may be opposed to slavery, but what care the British statesmen, the politicians, the men of the world, the men who clutch office and power, and whose every energy and effort and purpose is still further to advance and develop the power of England, the fast-anchored isle, about slavery? Nothing. All the interest they feel in it is that it shall be the fatal rock of the great Republic upon which our ship of State shall strike and by which it shall go down.

I have no doubt that Louis Napoleon two years ago, and at any time within that period that he could have procured the consent and the coordinate action of England, would have recognized the independence of the rebel States, and, if necessary, would have interfered by the power of his fleets and his armies, combined with those of England, as they were combined against Turkey, for the purpose of establishing the independence of the rebel States. I do not doubt now that the vast preponderance of the sympathy of the people of England and France, and of Europe generally, of their rulers, of their statesmen, of their politicians, is that this fatal schism between the North and the South, sectionally, (against which the Father of his Country raised his warning voice in such wise and prophetic terms,) never shall be healed. They want the North and the South to proceed on in the fight of the Kilkenny cats; they want the two combatants to be eaten all up to their tails, and whenever one is likely to eat up the other they will intervene. Even before that point in the combat is reached, Louis Napoleon will intervene, I have no doubt, as France intervened in the revolutionary war between the struggling colonies and the mother country. They will never permit the South to be subjugated. It is not their interest to do so. It is not their policy to do so. All Europe is opposed to the reunion of this Confederation, except Russia, and Russia is neutral. We have a part of the sympathies of that Government merely on account of our relative geographical locations. We are so far apart from each other that no collision of interest, of ambition, of empire, or of trade, can ever cause any serious difficulty between the two countries.

Now, Mr. President, I will conclude by reading a short extract from a letter written by Mr. Webster in 1851. If Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster had not been living in 1850, disruption would probably then have taken place. It was only their genius, their eloquence, their statesmanship, their intellectual power, and the moral influence they exercised over the people of the United States that then prevented it. Mr. Webster lost caste at home and sacrificed much of his popularity by the course he took in favor of the compromise measures of 1850, and in favor of that very fugitive slave law against which the Senator from Massachusetts has been thundering all his formidable caliber. In a private letter to some gentlemen in New York, to be found in his Private Correspondence, volume two, page 424, he says:

"If I have attempted to expound the Constitution, I have attempted to expound that which I have studied with diligence and veneration from my early manhood to the present day."

Sir, if gentlemen here would scoff less, and listen with a little more attention, and give the truths enunciated by Mr. Webster, if not himself, a little more respect, they would be quite as decorously and profitably engaged as they are now.

"If I have endeavored to defend and uphold the Union of the States, it is because my fixed judgment and my unalterable affection have impelled me and still impel me to regard the Union as the only security for general prosperity and national glory. Yes, gentlemen, the Constitution and the Union! I place them together."

I say, the Constitution and the Union now and forever; I say, down with and death to all their enemies, whether internal or external, whether in the form of Jeff. Davis or Abraham Lincoln, or in any other form. The people of the United States owe it to themselves, they owe it to their great Government which their fathers formed for them, they owe it to their posterity, they owe it to the best and dearest hopes of mankind to defend the Union and the Constitution to their last and their latest breath. The Constitution and Union cannot be separated. It is more impossible to do it than to separate the Siamese twins, and I am told by anatomists that it would be impossible to sever the ligament that binds them together without causing their mutual destruction. Certainly the Union and the Constitution of the United States are bound together more vitally, more indissolubly than the Siamese twins.

"Yes, gentlemen, the Constitution and the Union! I place them together. If they stand they must stand together; if they fall they must fall together. They are images which present to every American his surest reliance and his brightest hopes."

"If they perish in my day or afterwards, I shall still leave in the history of the times my own deep, heartfelt, and engrossing conviction that they are among the greatest political blessings ever bestowed by Providence on man; and that if in any course of disastrous events, such as may happen to all human institutions, they should become severed and broken, even their history and their memories will constitute a track of light upon which all lovers of human liberty in after times may gaze with admiration. Yes, gentlemen, Union and the Constitution!

"Fortunati ambo! Se quid mea carmina possunt,
Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet aëvo,
Dum domus Eneæ Capitolii innoxia saxum
Accolet imperiumque pater Romanus habebit."

"I was not unaware, gentlemen, on the morning of the 7th March, last year, that I was entering upon a duty which, as you suggest, might bring into peril that favor which has been so long shown me by that political party whose general principles I had for a long time steadfastly maintained."

"A crisis had arrived in which it did not become me, as I thought, to be indifferent and to do nothing. Still less did it become me to act a part, which should inflame sectional animosities, and tend to destroy all genuine American feeling and shake the fabric of the Government to its foundation. I was willing to trust, and am still willing to trust, for the vindication of my motives to the intelligent men of my party and of all parties. I should indeed have been wholly unworthy of that character which it is my highest ambition to maintain among my countrymen if I had allowed any personal peril to bear with the weight of a feather against my profound sense of public duty."

"Whatever may now happen, I shall meet it with a clear conscience and firm purpose; and while acting in full cooperation with the great mass of our fellow-citizens who hold the same sentiments that you hold, I shall fear nothing."

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky who has just taken his seat were to go back to the Legislature that elected him, in my humble judgment he would have to wear a label or a card upon his back upon which should be written, "I am Garrett Davis, the Union Senator from Kentucky," in order that those who sent him here might recognize him. When the honorable Senator took his seat here, the first speech that he made was in favor of expelling one Jesse D. Bright, because he had, as I think, treasonably written and acted in support of this rebellion. He next drew up a resolution to expel his own colleague because he had expressed sympathy in favor of the southern rebellion and was not heartily in sympathy with the present Administration, which he was bound to uphold and defend. In the course of the discussion on that resolution the honorable Senator made a very fierce attack on his honorable colleague, which I regret to state was responded to in language which went to show that if his colleague was a traitor the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat was a much greater traitor.

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky did more; he drew up and urged here the most ultra confiscation act that ever was presented to the Senate; and yet, sir, for the last eighteen months he has been traducing and abusing every man who stands on the same platform on which he stood when he entered the Senate. He has been so absorbed with a passion for nullification that he thrusts it upon the Senate whether the occasion be opportune or not, and not one man in the crowded galleries who had not heard the subject announced from the Chair could conceive from his tirade what question was really before the Senate. Tonight, again, sir, for two hours, the honorable Senator, without a moment's interval devoted to any practical topic, has abused the Government of these United States and the constituted authorities. He commenced with a comparison between George III. of England, and the Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and between the Cabinet of the President and the ministry of the king. Mr. President, three years ago Judah P. Benjamin, then Senator from Louisiana, now secretary of state in the cabinet of the rebel chief, stood on the other side of this Chamber and drew the same parallel in the course of the speech with which he closed his senatorial office here to take up arms against the Government which had honored and supported him. But there the parallel ends. Judah P. Benjamin, Robert Toombs, and Jefferson Davis boldly maintained their sentiments; they had the courage to take up arms against the Government, and were willing to abide the issue. The honorable Senator from Kentucky comes into this Chamber this day under the folds and the protection of the stars and stripes, and utters the same treasonable sentiments, draws the same treasonable parallel, but pursues not the same bold course of responsible daring in treason. He finds it safer garrulously to reiterate forty-times uttered speeches, the staple of which is abuse

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 210.

of those in authority and denunciation of those who would serve and preserve the Union.

The honorable Senator is not only the vilifier of his compeers, but he assumes to be the interpreter of the designs of the Deity. This country, he oracularly proclaims, was made by God Almighty for white men; but he did not find it convenient to explain how the great Creator of worlds showed His determination to set this apart as a white man's domain through the red skins with which He peopled this continent. [Laughter.]

The white man came, and the honorable Senator is not satisfied yet; he would amend the immortal Declaration of Independence to read thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all white men are created equal." [Laughter.] Jefferson falls beneath his censure for the omission of the word "white;" and his exquisite critical acumen discovers defective expression in the commandment and the sacred law. A certain lawyer once approached the Saviour of mankind and asked Him a question, tempting Him, and saying:

"Master, which is the great commandment in the law?"

"Jesus said unto him, thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind."

"This is the first and great commandment."

"And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

"On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

The honorable Senator from Kentucky perhaps questions the accuracy of the translation or the correctness of the text, for he cannot believe that He who spake as never man spake propounded the law other than

"Thou shalt love thy white neighbor as thyself."

With him all but the white are excluded from human sympathy; but I, Mr. President, am disposed with undoubting faith to take the law and the prophets as I find them. I am disposed to follow them rather than to follow my sympathizing secession friend from Kentucky. Every effort which he has made during this session, with all my private personal regard for him, I am compelled to assert, has been to block and retard the wheels of Government. Assuredly he has raised no arm against this rebellion, he has uttered no war cry against treason, he has not lifted up his voice in defense of the constituted authorities of the country, nor has he given utterance to one single idea calculated to strengthen the power and authority of this Government; not one. All he has done has tended to destruction and ruin, and the long vista of desolation in Kentucky may be traceable in its causes to some extent to the spirit and the influences of the Senator from Kentucky. Every man who joins Morgan in his raid, every sympathizer of that black-hearted robber and traitor, may appeal to that honorable Senator for strength and support and countenance in his work of destruction. Can it be supposed, sir, if the honorable Senator from Kentucky and his colleagues here and in the House of Representatives had stood up manfully in support of this Government we should have seen such developments of treason in Kentucky as we have beheld? No, sir.

The honorable Senator has spoken by the hour and by the day against negro troops who are fighting for the suppression of the rebellion, and yet we learn that the Governor of Kentucky was cooped up the other day in Frankfort, and never could have got out if it had not been for the armed negro soldiers of Kentucky who valiantly went from Lexington to Frankfort and by their gallantry and their valor released him from the rebel blockade which surrounded him. It is all well enough for negroes to protect the Governor of Kentucky, it is all very well for them to fight the battles of Kentuckians; but they have no interest in this Government and are only fit to be sneered at in every speech which the honorable Senator makes upon this floor!

The Senator has iterated and reiterated a hundred times upon this floor that if we had passed the "Crittenden compromise" we should have had no war. That honorable Senator knows as well as any man knows that at the session of Congress when the Crittenden compromise was introduced to the Senate of the United States there was a majority, a large majority, of Democratic members upon the other side of this Chamber. He knows well that Jefferson Davis could at any time on any single proposition have carried a majority of the Senate; and yet when those men, regardless of their obligations to the country, determined upon open rebellion, determined that neither that nor any other proposition should save this Union, left the Senate Chamber, though they had the control of it, he turns round and charges it upon the minority of this body. Is it fair? Is it manly? Is it statesmanlike? Is it honorable?

Why, Mr. President, the truth is, the honorable Senator is, upon this question at least, wrong at heart. He looks at President Lincoln precisely as Judah P. Benjamin looks at him, and he quotes the letters of Lord North just as Judah P. Benjamin quoted them. He has adopted their line of argument, and has exhausted it over and over again.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss this question; I rose simply to say that if that honorable Senator had adhered to the sentiments which he enunciated when he first came into this Senate, if he had run the race, if he had kept the faith, Kentucky, in my humble judgment, would this day have raised up a wall of fire against this rebellion, which would have rolled it back with a power such as you would have seen perhaps in no other State. But it has not been so, and there is nobody that regrets it more than I do.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. Will my honorable friend from Indiana allow me a few minutes?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that it is my purpose to say something on the bill that is before the Senate; but if the Senator from Kentucky insists on my yielding, as he has not occupied any of the time of the Senate to-night, I suppose I shall have to yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say a few words personal to myself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As it is manifest now that no business can be done to-night, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not yielded the floor to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order, that it is not competent for the Senator from Indiana to yield the floor to particular persons. He must give up the floor altogether or retain it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Illinois is right of course I shall not insist. I care but very little about the matter; but I wish to say something about the bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that by the practice of the Senate the Senator from Indiana has not lost his right to the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say, if the Senator from Indiana will allow me, as the Chair rules him to be entitled to the floor, that I have no sort of objection to his proceeding, and I should not have suggested an adjournment but for the fact that we have been detained here two hours to-night by a speech in reference to other matters than the question before the Senate, and an attempt is made to continue it, and for one I do not desire to sit here and hear it. But if the Senator from Indiana desires to address the Senate—he never addresses it except upon occasions and in language pertinent to the question under consideration—I have no wish to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana to allow me a few minutes to repel a personal attack upon myself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If I yield the floor for a purpose of that sort, do I abandon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that a Senator yielding to another Senator to make a speech thereby loses the right to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Kentucky, then, insist upon it when I inform him that I wish to discuss the bill that is before the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS. With the least opposition on the part of the Senator from Indiana I shall not insist; but I merely ask a courtesy that has never been refused to any Senator, according to my observation, to say a few words in reply to a personal assault.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well, I give way.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is not true that I have changed a solitary opinion since I have come into the Senate, or a solitary principle. It is not true as asserted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] that I have reversed my position and my principles and my course since I took my seat in the Senate, and I challenge him or any man whatever to prove the contrary by a production of my speeches. In the speech to which he refers, which was not the first but the second that I made in the Senate, I condemned as unsparingly then the course of the abolitionists as I have done to-night, or as I ever have done in my life; and I said distinctly that if I had the power I would hang the rebels and the abolitionists in pairs, and if I had the power to-night I would do the same, and among them I would hang the Senator from Minnesota. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order! There must be no applause in the galleries.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I never did introduce the most stringent confiscation bill that has ever been proposed in the Congress of the United States. There was an unconstitutional, unjust, and iniquitous confiscation bill introduced, which received the unqualified and hearty support of the Senator from Minnesota and other Senators; and with a view of getting a better one I introduced another bill that subjected every case to trial by jury according to the forms of the common law and of the Constitution. I have been reproved once before in the same terms substantially with which the Senator now reproaches me, and I then showed the charge was untrue, that I never had introduced a confiscation bill of anything like the character of the one that was afterwards passed. Sir, if that confiscation bill which I introduced as a substitute for an unjust and an unconstitutional measure be looked at it will be found that no man was to be punished, and no man was to be deprived of his property, personal or real, unless on presentment by a grand jury, and a trial in civil courts according to the civil law, by the judgment of his peers, and I would vote to-night for such a bill.

The honorable Senator has said that I have never uttered a word in favor of sustaining the Government at this session. When I came here I found the Crittenden resolution setting forth the principles and policy upon which the war was to be conducted. I read the yeas and nays in favor of that resolution and of those principles, and I found the name of the Senator from Minnesota recorded in its favor, if I recollect aright.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to ask if the Senator alludes to what is known as the compromise resolutions of Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. I allude to the resolution offered by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, that was understood to have been drawn up by Mr. Crittenden, the resolution which asserted the purposes, the grounds, and the principles upon which this war was to be conducted; that it was not to be conducted in a spirit of vengeance, that it was not to be conducted with a view to deprive the people of the southern States of any of their rights or in hostility to any of their institutions, but to leave intact all the dignity and power of the States. The Senate is familiar with the terms and principles embodied in that resolution. Sir, in obedience to that resolution Mr. Lincoln wrote to our ministers to Russia and to Paris; in obedience to that resolution he called the members of Congress from the border slave States into friendly conference with him, and he there pledged himself, his word, his honor, his faith, which in a President of the United States and the successor of Washington ought to be held sacred, that he had neither the power nor the inclination, as he had before asseverated in his message, to interfere with slavery in the States. It is the Senator himself who has proved false and recreant to his solemn and recorded opinions. If he had adhered to them he would have found me sustaining the war conducted upon the policy and principles of the Crittenden resolution.

I defy the honorable Senator and I defy any man to search the record and to read the many speeches which he says I have made and reiterated so often, and to find the least inconsistency of principle between my present position and the position I avowed when I took my seat on this floor and for long years before.

The Senator speaks of my disloyalty. I tell him that if loyalty is to be faithful to the Constitution and all its principles and all its compromises, I am loyal; and if to be false to the Constitution and to all its principles and to all the liberties it secures to the people be disloyalty, the honorable Senator is one of the greatest criminals in this land. I can arraign him before any enlightened men; I can take his speeches and votes and mine, and I can prove my perfect consistency, and rectitude, and truth, and adherence to constitutional duty, and I can refute him in every particular of that kind.

Mr. WILKINSON. When this war commenced I had no idea of doing anything but save this country; I had no idea to oppress the people of the South, or to adopt any measures which were considered by anybody harsh or severe. But, sir, as this war has progressed, as the rebels have starved our prisoners, as they have butchered our captives, as they have slaughtered in cold blood our prisoners whom they have taken, I am for desolation, and I am for subjugation, and I am for the exercise of all the power that will crush these infernal, damnable fiends under our feet.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Minnesota a few minutes ago, relying no doubt upon a false statement read to the House of Representatives the other day, said that negroes had lately defended the capital of Kentucky. That is not so. Even the Administration paper in Frankfort, the Commonwealth, denies it. It has been denied by the Governor of Kentucky. It was a lie out of the whole cloth. The capital was defended by the Governor with a very few troops and citizens; the school-boys came out. The Senator no doubt took his statement from a telegram which went forth.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will simply say that I saw a dispatch in the papers stating that Governor Bramlette had got a messenger through from Frankfort to Lexington and that some negro regiments were marched from Lexington to Frankfort, and that through their efforts he was released.

Mr. POWELL. The telegram was read in the House of Representatives the other day, and it was there denied and refuted, and a letter was presented from the Governor denying it. It was a lie out of the whole cloth.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have not been in favor of the bill before the Senate in its general purposes or in its special provisions; but I have felt it to be my duty to do what I could during the progress of its discussion to make it as near an acceptable and proper measure as possible. My purpose now is to state some general objections that I have to the measure, and some reasons why I shall feel it to be my duty to vote against the bill.

In the first place, I am not able to perceive how Congress possesses the power to enact the measure as proposed by the committee that has reported this bill. I am aware that some of the provisions of the bill may be enacted by Congress; as, for instance, that portion of the bill which authorizes certain officers to take possession of Government property and Government lands and manage them for the benefit of the Government. I do not question that it is proper for Congress to provide a set of officers to take charge of the public property; but that portion of the bill is not the main purpose and feature of the measure.

The purpose of the bill is shown in the first section, from which I will read a few words:

That an office is hereby created in the Treasury Department to be called the Bureau of Freedmen, meaning thereby such persons as have become free since the beginning of the present war, under the care of a Commissioner, &c.

This indicates the purpose of the bill. It is to provide a bureau to take charge of such persons as have become free since the beginning of the present war. I ask the Senator who is the author of this measure—I mean of the substitute reported by our committee—what is the condition and status of persons who have become free during the war? I dare say he will reply that they are citizens of the United States. In that opinion I do not concur. I know the Attorney General has expressed that opinion, and in that I think he has reflected less credit upon his ability and learning as a jurist than in many other opinions which it has become his duty to deliver. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, has decided that they are not and cannot become citizens of the United States. But without reference to that question, which I do not now choose to discuss, for the purpose of the argument, assuming that the position of the Senator is correct and that they become citizens of the United States as soon as they are made free, what then is their relation to the Federal Government? Why shall Congress take charge of them, their property, their interests, and their contracts? The Senator replies that they are ignorant, unable to take care of themselves, that they are to some extent wards upon the General Government, and therefore it is proper, inasmuch as they have just come out of a state of servitude and ignorance into a state of freedom, not competent to take care of themselves, that the Government of the United States shall provide in these many respects for them. I am not able to see how the Government of the United States can discharge this duty toward any citizen or any inhabitant who is not a citizen. Is the Government of the United States the parent of all the people in that sense that the Government of England is the parent of all the people of the British empire? By no means. Each State government has toward its inhabitants that relation. Can the Government of the United States appoint a guardian to take possession of the property and to take charge of the person of one who, because of tender years or because of want of intellect, is not competent and able to take care of himself or his property? The Senator will not insist upon that. That is a power which belongs exclusively to the States of the Confederacy and not at all to the General Government.

Then, sir, upon the ground on which the Senator has maintained this measure, I am not able to see that under the Constitution Congress may enact such a measure as this. Is it replied that Congress takes charge in a very similar manner of the Indians and that we provide for them? That answer will not do. There are many reasons why Congress may legislate in respect to the Indians which do not apply to a measure like this. The Indians occupy toward this Government a very peculiar position. They were in possession of the public domain; they had what the Government recognized as a possessory right, a right that was to be extinguished by treaty with them; by treaty between the Government and the tribes the possessory right of the Indians to a portion of their land at least has been extinguished, and for that the Government has agreed to pay annuities and has assumed a guardianship over the Indians. They occupy the public Territories not within the jurisdiction of the States; and because they occupy the Territories and because they are to some extent not fully tribes, nations, people, we legislate as we have legislated in regard to them.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has the power to take the charge of a portion of the community simply because that portion of the community is not competent to take care of itself. Such a power would swallow up to a very large extent a very important portion of the powers enjoyed by the States. But I do not choose to discuss that question further. I have some other objections to this bill to which I will very briefly allude. It is a ponderous measure. What it is, where it will carry us, and to what extent it will become a burden on the national Treasury, no Senator can now say. It has its seat of power in the Treasury Department according to the present framework of the bill—a Commissioner, assistant commissioners, and a suitable number of clerks. That may not be very much; the Treasury without serious embarrassment may bear that burden; but I ask the attention of Senators to the consideration of the second section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to create departments of freedmen.

A new division of the country! Congress has recognized the Confederacy as an aggregate—States, counties, and other political subdivisions made by enactments of Congress or by the provisions of the State constitutions and laws; but here is a new division of the country into “departments of freedmen.” The States are to be cut up and to be placed under the charge of commissioners. I believe the number of these commissioners is now limited in the bill to two for each State. Am I right in that respect?

Mr. SUMNER. Not more than two.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then each State is to be divided, so that there shall be two departments with a commissioner over each:

And each department shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,000, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, at a compensation not exceeding the ordinary rate for similar services.

Mr. SUMNER. That has been amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So as to fix the salary, but not in respect to the number of superintendents, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. As to the number also; “not, however, to exceed four in each district.”

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is, four local superintendents to each department, but how many clerks I am not informed.

Mr. SUMNER. Not to exceed four in each district in the whole of local superintendents and clerks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then allow me to say to the Senator that if he has thus limited the number of superintendents they will be unable to accomplish the work that he designs. Here is to be a government within a Government, the Government of the United States to be over the white people and the colored people alike, according to the philosophy of the Senator, and within that Government is to be another government over a portion of the community, over a class of the inhabitants, having its seat of power in the Treasury Department, and its arms extending into each State of the southern portion of the Confederacy, with two commissioners in each State, and under each of these four superintendents and a suitable number of clerks; and all these are to constitute a government over inhabitants amounting to at least three millions and perhaps approaching near to four millions, if the final purpose and policy of the Senator from Massachusetts be carried out and emancipation be the result.

This, sir, is a remarkable spectacle, that within the government and independent of the States and almost independent of the ordinary machinery of the Federal Government, there shall be a government established for the control of the inhabitants of a particular class. I should not favor a measure of this sort even if the Constitution conferred the power.

But, sir, consider the enormous expense of this measure. I know very well that at the end of a year it will be said that four superintendents in each district, or eight superintendents in a State to take charge of so large a number of freedmen, to see to the contracts of each, to attend to the lawsuits of each in every court, are entirely inadequate; and the Senator will then change his measure so as to have it read as it did in the first place, “local superintendents and clerks so far as the same may be needed.” That will be finally the measure if the policy and purpose of the Senator is intended to be accomplished and secured. A magnificent scheme, establishing a government for a portion of the inhabitants of the country at great cost to the Federal Treasury! I am not in favor of it.

I desire, then, to call the attention of the Senate to the enormous powers that are to be conferred on this new government, this government within a Government. In the first place, these officials are to take charge of the persons of between three and four million people. The Senator first said that they must do this according to the spirit of the Constitution; but feeling that that was rather ridiculous, when it was suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, he abandoned that, and he now leaves the colored people that may become free to be under the supervision, to a large extent under the control, of these superintendents and I suppose such agents as they may employ. And yet they are to be free! But what are these superintendents to do in respect to these colored people? They are certainly to have a superintendence over them. They are to see to their contracts; they are to see how they shall labor; they are to see how they are treated by other persons, not only in respect to the colored people themselves, but in respect to their relations with the white people these superintendents are to be over them and above them. Does the Senator like a government of that kind where even the contracts that are to be made by the colored people with the white people are to be supervised by these superintendents? If the white people treat them unkindly or not, according to law, the Government of the United States through these superintendents is to appear in the courts as the representative of this particular class of people. This is a new feature in our legislation. I think we have had nothing like it before. I know that the States, following the example of England, have provided for the representation in courts by competent persons of poor people; but has it ever occurred to the Senate of the United States that this Government should assume to represent in the courts of the United States every person who was not able to represent himself? That is one of the duties of these superintendents, to appear in court to manage the lawsuits and perhaps to employ attorneys to represent these colored people whenever their interests shall be controverted and contested in the courts of the country.

Then, sir, the control of the persons of this class of inhabitants, the control of their lawsuits, the control of their contracts, the control of their property, the control of their time, the control of their labor is to be placed in the hands of these superintendents.

Again, Mr. President, no measure of this kind can be so carried out as that it will not lead to oppression and fraud. I admit that some guards have been thrown around this measure since its introduction. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is a guard that will perhaps to some extent prevent abuse and fraud; but surely Senators know very well that it will not accomplish very much. Even the terror of a military court, the highest terror that can be addressed to the mind of man in this country; a terror almost equal to the Inquisition, which shocked us all when we were more youthful as we read of it—even that terror will not be sufficient to prevent the frauds. Why, sir, what have we heard within the last two years of the transactions down the Mississippi river by officers in your Army; by men that were amenable to court-martial; by men that were liable to be disgraced; by men that were liable to have their offices taken from them, and to be punished in the severest manner possible? Do not Senators know that when the temptation was presented, more officers fell before that temptation than any of us expected? Cotton speculation to a certain extent has corrupted your Army, and it has been charged to have been the cause of a defeat of a very important branch of the Army. A military court with the terror of its punishment has not been sufficient to prevent speculation and fraud even among officers of the Army.

Then, sir, if officers who stand upon honor, who generally are honorable men, fall before this temptation, what do you expect of these irresponsible agents of a Department—men who are appointed because they are local or cross-road politicians—men who never can secure a high and honorable office, but wish to get down South that they may speculate and plunder? What do you expect from that class of men who will take an office like this? If honorable men, if the men of your Army who are controlled by the highest sentiment of honor, have fallen, until it has become to some extent a disgrace to the whole country, what do you expect from the politicians, the men who pull the wires for party, who are appointed to offices as partisan rewards? What do you expect of them when they get down into the southern country, far removed from the eye of the Department, where the Secretary of the Treasury can know very little about their transactions?

What check is there upon them? You say they are sworn. A man that will steal pays but little attention to his oath. You say they will be punished by court-martial. By whom will you prove all this? Suppose they are guilty of frauds; do you expect to prove it by the negroes that surround them? Those negroes within three months will fall under their control and be as afraid of them as they were of their former masters. You might as well expect to prove a crime against the master by the testimony of his slave as to convict one of these superintendents by the testimony of the colored people under their control. By the white population do you expect to convict them? What population? By whom will they be surrounded? When one of these superintendents goes upon a plantation that is being worked for the Government and takes the bales of cotton from that plantation and disposes of them and makes no fair and honest return to the Treasury Department of the proceeds, by whom are you to prove all that? The negroes do not go with him to the market. Will you prove it by the rebels in the neighborhood? The rebels in the neighborhood take no interest in the question whether the cotton is accounted for or not. Will you prove it by the loyal people in the neighborhood? It is my opinion you will not find many of that sort of people in the neighborhood. This provision that was intended to prevent fraud and plundering will be found practically to accomplish nothing.

But, sir, not only do you place the control of three million people under a set of new officers sent from the North down to manage a class of people that they are not acquainted with, not accustomed to, and that are not accustomed to them, but you place the Government property of the southern portion of the country in the hands of these men to manage and to conduct. It is my purpose simply to allude to, without elaborately discussing, these different features of the bill and to call the attention of Senators to them and to ask Senators if they are going to support a measure containing so many dangers and so few virtues.

Mr. President, there is a provision in this bill as it now stands to which I wish to advert very briefly. It has been very maturely discussed in the Senate, but I would not feel that I had done my duty did I not allude to it. I refer to the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] Two years ago next month a law was passed providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels. That confiscation, if Senators will recollect, was not to be enforced by the Army. The officer that took possession of a section of country could not enforce that confiscation. It was by a judicial proceeding; and I will call the attention of Senators to the provisions of the bill. By the fifth section of that law it was provided that "to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estates and property, money, stocks, credits, &c., of the persons hereinafter named." This section of the bill provided for the seizure of the property of persons connected with the rebellion; but that was not sufficient; a seizure did not vest in the Government a title. Then the seventh section provided:

"That to secure the condemnation and sale of any of such property after the same shall have been seized, so that it may be made available for the purpose aforesaid, proceedings in rem shall be instituted in the name of the United States in any district court thereof, or in any territorial court of the United States."

So that Senators will observe that the confiscation was the result of a judicial proceeding, that the seizure did not confiscate, but it became confiscated upon the judgment of the court. When that bill went to the President of the United States he was not satisfied to approve it. That bill did not provide in express terms that the judgment of a court should cause a forfeiture of the estate in fee, but it did not limit it to the life of the rebel, and the President of the United States said he would sign no such bill; and before the signature of that bill Congress, I suppose, understanding the condition of the Executive mind, sent to the President a joint resolution explanatory of the bill, amending it, and among other things providing:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceeding, and no act be construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

Before the President returned the confiscation bill to the House of Representatives with his veto this joint resolution explanatory of the act went to him, and he, signing them both, sent them both to the Senate and House of Representatives at the same time with his message. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the message of the President:

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Considering the bill for "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," and the joint resolution explanatory of said act, as being substantially one, I have approved and signed both.

Before I was informed of the resolution, I had prepared the draft of a message stating objections to the bill becoming a law, a copy of which draft is herewith submitted.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

July 17, 1862.

The President of the United States would not sign the bill until he signed the joint resolution, and in this message to Congress he said that he regarded the joint resolution and the bill as one measure, constituting one act, the joint resolution modifying the bill so as according to his judgment to remove the constitutional objection. In the veto message which the President said he had prepared, after giving many objections to the measure, approving some of the sections of the bill and disapproving some, he said:

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever."

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason, not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained.' True, there is to be no formal attainder in this case; still, I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted in a different form for the same offense."

"With great respect I am constrained to say I think this feature of the act is unconstitutional. It would not be difficult to modify it."

It was modified by the joint resolution, and then received the approval and signature of the President. With Senators in the majority this ought to have weight. Two years ago the Senate yielded to the judgment of the President on this subject. Has the Constitution been since changed? I know that the Constitution has been since trampled upon, but in form that provision remains yet, that attainder of treason shall not work forfeiture of the estate beyond the life of the traitor. The President said that in no form of proceeding, whether in rem or in personam, could you reach the estate of the person guilty beyond his life, and that after that it must go to his children. If I were of the majority I should not wish to present a question like this to the President of the United States. Senators when they support this measure are presumed to expect the executive approval. Do Senators who say that it is my duty to support the Executive feel justified in presenting to him a measure which they know he must veto? Do Senators do right in presenting to the Executive that which they know in advance he must of necessity veto in a time like this, and especially a war measure? If the President vetoes it there is a clash between him and the Congress: either congressional influence is weakened before the country or the position and influence of the President are weakened before the country, neither of which, in a time like this, is to be desired. Then are Senators of the majority willing to send to the President a bill that they know in advance he must veto?

But if he approve the bill, what then? More unfortunate still, because then he approves a bill which he has said was unconstitutional, and by his own evidence he stands before the country approving an act which the Constitution forbids when he stands before God and man pledged in the most solemn manner to protect and defend the Constitution. Are Senators of the majority then willing in a time like this for no good purpose, in my judgment, to force the Executive into a position like that? It would be quite bad enough for one of us of the minority that perhaps do not feel quite so great a responsibility as the gentlemen of the majority—it would be quite enough for us to press on the President a thing like that. I reflect once—I was too young to know very much about these questions and too careless about them to care much—that the Democracy in Congress vindicated themselves before the country in voting for the Wilmot proviso on the ground that they intended to test President Taylor on that question. I never could see the morality of it; I never could see the right of it; but I did feel afterwards, when I knew more about public affairs than I did then, that it was a heavy blow on the head of the Democracy when they gave that vote. It never does good to try to place any department of the Government in a false position before the country. I do not think the minority here have that right; and it is upon my conscience to treat the President of the United States in these times fairly and honestly.

Two years ago the majority, when they found the President could not, upon his conscience, say that there should be a forfeiture beyond the life of the owner, yielded to that, although the majority had not then said in plain terms by law that it should go beyond the life; they accommodated the conscience of the President upon that question, and came to the letter of the Constitution and said the forfeiture should not be beyond the life, and they got the approval of the President. After getting his approval by a joint resolution, have you a right now to strike that joint resolution out which secured his approval? I put it to you as honorable men. Two years ago you secured his approval, by this joint resolution, of a measure that, upon his conscience and under his oath, he said he could not approve standing alone; and having secured his approval, have you a right now to strike that joint resolution from under him? It is for gentlemen of the majority to decide that question. I shall stand by what I believe to be the Constitution and the right. If there were no constitutional question in this, if my feet were not at all fettered by the provision of the Constitution, yet knowing the fact that Congress had secured an executive approval by a joint resolution, I would not vote to strike that joint resolution from under his feet. You said he might stand upon it, and you have no right to take that platform from underneath him. It is fair to let him stand there. He has said deliberately to the country this is his conscience on the subject, and will you pay no regard to his conscience upon it? You did two years ago, and why not now? Have your hearts become more cruel that you will not stop where you did then? What did the majority say two years ago in this law? That to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion the President shall seize the property of rebels for the purpose of confiscation; the case shall go into the court as a proceeding in rem, and the judicial proceedings shall result in a judgment, and judgment in sale, and thereby confiscation. That is what you said, not merely as a matter of punishment, but as a law to be held in terrorem over the rebel.

"That to insure the speedy termination of the rebellion." That was the purpose of the law as declared in its own letter. To secure a speedy termination of the rebellion you passed this law, and how? By threatening rebels that if they do not come back within a certain time after the proclamation of the President is issued they shall be liable by a forfeiture of their estates for life, not as a punishment after it is all over. And although my party associations do not make me a very ardent admirer of General Frémont, yet I must say that on this subject of confiscation I think he has expressed better philosophy than almost any gentleman of his party. In the commencement of a rebellion it may be well and wise to deter men from going into it, to say to them "If you do it you do it under the liability of losing your estates;" but when the rebellion is nearly through or quite through, as a matter of mere punishment it is not to be respected. Forfeiture as a matter of punishment is not a favorite idea in America; it never has been, and I pray to God it never may be. We can see something of its work, if we read the history of England, in the civil broils and strifes that for so many years rent that country, especially during the wars of the Roses, when the victor of to-day might be the captive of to-morrow, and estates were being confiscated. The effect upon society of the confiscation was anything but good, as all readers of the history of that country very well know. And when our fathers came to frame this Constitution they said that the sins of the father should not be visited upon the children; and is there a Senator here that will not respond from his heart to that sentiment of our glorious fathers? Who wants to pursue the child for the sin of the father? The infidel world for centuries has carped at that passage in the decalogue in which it is said that the sins of the father are visited upon the children to the third and fourth generations, because that was not well understood. In my judgment, the effect of the sins of the fathers is to fall upon the children; but I do not think it is a decree of Heaven that the child shall be punished for the sins of the father.

But without reference to that, is any Senator here willing to say that the position assumed by our fathers in the Constitution was wrong? And now leaving out the letter what is the spirit of the Constitution? I choose to be governed by the spirit when it is plain and manifest. It is that when the traitor is brought into court and is tried and by his peers condemned his estate shall not be forfeited beyond his lifetime. That is the letter. If we take his property without taking his person, and upon an ex parte proceeding, a proceeding in rem alone will decree a forfeiture of his estate, can that proceeding go further than if there were the full investigation of the merits of this conduct in court? It is absurd to say it. It is not a proper construction of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I have said very nearly all upon this subject that I desire to say. I felt that there were these serious objections to this measure. It is a measure of very considerable consequence to the country, and I did not feel that I could give my vote against it without making these brief remarks. I regret that I have felt it my duty at so late an hour of the night to occupy the attention of the Senate at all. It is a grave question, especially the question presented by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. Does any Senator believe that this rebellion is to be put down by laying his hand upon the property of the children for the crime of the fathers? I do not believe such cruelty will ever be blessed by Heaven. It is not according to the course of Providence that it should be blessed.

When we come to settle this great account about this rebellion, I know now very well how it will be settled if it is ever settled upon a basis of reunion. It will be settled by no such principles as are found in the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. And while the counsels such as are incorporated into this amendment prevail I look for no peace, I look for no restoration. The Senator says that he wants to see the rebel killed, destroyed, destruction all over his land, and he had almost said that he wished he was visited with damnation. Senators, if you want to settle this great question, will you send the Senator from Illinois to settle it? Who here takes counsel of his hatred? In this body we represent not only the present but the future. It may be for the time that we would gratify a passion of the hour, but when we look to the future, full of consequences to our children, we certainly are not willing to be governed by the sentiments that the Senator says animated him when he presented this amendment. Mr. President, I will move to strike from the amendment of the committee the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, and upon that motion at the proper time I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Strike out the following section:

And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I will not stop to answer the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] because I do not think that the line of policy which he has adopted since he became a member of this Senate is such as to warrant the belief that he is thoroughly, heartily devoted to the cause of the Government in this contest, nor should I infer, either from his speeches or his votes, that he is very deeply enlisted in the cause for which our brave soldiers are fighting and suffering and dying on the battle-field.

But I rise to speak in regard to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] The Senator from Kentucky when he first came into this body came upon my motion: I moved to expel John C. Breckinridge, and upon my motion a vacancy was made that the Senator from Kentucky fills. I am sometimes inclined to regret that motion. I believe that John C. Breckinridge could not have rendered as much aid and comfort to the rebels in arms as his successor has done, and I sometimes regret that I moved his expulsion; but I did it, and I have no remarks to make about it. John C. Breckinridge was known to be a traitor to his Government; John C. Breckinridge was in arms against his Government; John C. Breckinridge has been fighting against the Government like an honest man, if a traitor can be an honest man.

Several SENATORS. You mean an honest rebel. Mr. CHANDLER. So far as the rebels are concerned, fighting like an honest man. But John C. Breckinridge has not rendered one tithe of the aid and comfort to rebels that his successor has done. He has fought perhaps, and fought well. I do not know. He is a traitor; an open, an avowed, a bold traitor; but he has done very little in my estimation to injure the Union cause. I moved his expulsion. Very soon after the arrival of the Senator from Kentucky he called upon me and desired me to move the expulsion of his colleague. I was disposed to do it because I believed his colleague and John C. Breckinridge were alike in their sentiments; but after a time I changed my views, and my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] did move the expulsion of the Senator's colleague, and I did not. A discussion of loyalty ensued, in which both the Senators from Kentucky engaged, and I was convinced by both of them that each was a traitor, and I said to the Senator from Minnesota, "If you will include both in your resolution I will vote to expel them both. I will not vote to expel either one of them unless you include both;" and I call upon the Senator from Minnesota to say if I did not say that to him.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is so.

Mr. CHANDLER. Their arguments were both conclusive. There was no dodging either of their arguments. Each Senator proved his colleague to be a traitor beyond any peradventure whatever. I did not vote to expel the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] and I made a mistake in stating the other night that I did vote to expel him. I had forgotten it. I thought I did, but I did not. I did not vote at all; I dodged the vote; but, sir, I would have voted to expel both, if my friend from Minnesota had done what I asked him to do, but he did not do it. We have been sitting here for three years listening to treason, absolute treason, nothing more nor less. The very men who elected the Senator from Kentucky have assured me that the State of Kentucky never would have sent him here if they had known his sentiments. Mr. President, I wish to be parliamentary in my language; I accuse no man on this floor of being a traitor.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you make that accusation against me?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir, I do not; I say I accuse no man.

Mr. DAVIS. You did it a few minutes ago.

Mr. CHANDLER. I accuse no man of being a traitor.

Mr. DAVIS. You accused me of being a traitor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I tell the gentleman I accuse no man of being a traitor; but if you want to make a personal contest with me you can have it.

Mr. DAVIS advanced toward Mr. CHANDLER's desk.

Mr. HALE. Order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I say I accuse no man on this floor of being a traitor, because every man has taken an oath to support this Government, and I accuse no man on this floor of being a traitor. I assume that no man can take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and support this Government and be a traitor. But I say that no man can support and sustain the southern confederacy by his votes, by his speeches, by his action, by his whole course, and be a worthy member of this Senate of the United States. That is what I say; that is what I mean; that is what I affirm.

I believe, sir, that this rebellion is to be crushed, is to be exterminated, and I believe that every man who favors it, whether he be a member of this body or a member of the southern army, is to be crushed and to be exterminated unless he repents. That is what I believe. I believe, sir, that this rebellion is to-day upon its last legs. No matter for our little reverses, no matter for our repulses, no matter what may occur, I believe that this Government is to be sustained and maintained, and carried through to eternity. That is what I believe. I do not care whether you believe in the "nigger" or not; the Government will stand, "nigger" or no "nigger." Sir, this Government was more bitterly menaced on the 4th day of March, 1861, than it has ever been since. At that time Captain Buchanan, afterwards commanding the rebel monster Merrimac, was in command of our navy-yard here, was in command of our naval and military supplies, and every man in command in this District was a traitor to the Government, and John C. Breckinridge, your predecessor, was here sustaining every man of them. Sir, this Government went through its hour of peril in 1861. It had traitors in every single Department of the Government, every one; traitors in the navy-yard, and a traitor in command of the police of this Capitol, who is to-day an officer in the rebel army; traitors in every Department of this Government, traitors in your Treasury, traitors in your War Department. The rebel traitor Lee was in your War Department on the 4th of March. Thompson, of Mississippi, a traitor and a thief, was in the Interior Department; Floyd, a traitor and a thief, in your War Department; all traitors and thieves in command in the prominent positions under your Government. Well, sir, we got rid of traitors and thieves. To-day we have loyal men in command of our armies; we have loyal men in our Departments; we have loyal men in the Senate of the United States; we have loyal men in every Department of this Government, and we no more rely upon the Lees or the Buchanans to fight our battles. In 1861 we had disloyal men in command of our armies, traitors; to-day they are all either dismissed or laid on the shelf, every one of them. To-day we have loyal men; men who will put down this accursed, damnable rebellion at the point of the bayonet, no matter who stands up in this Senate for it.

Mr. President, I thank God that it is so. I thank God that we are to-day very nearly at the end of this accursed rebellion. I thank God that this nation has risen to the point of using every implement that the Almighty and common sense have put in it, hands to crush the rebellion. To-day we have more loyal men in the southern States than there are disloyal traitors. Through the disasters of this war, the rebels have lost many men and they have brought every man that can be brought into their ranks into them; and there are more loyal black men than there are disloyal traitors in the whole southern confederacy to-day, and I thank God for it; and I am in favor of doing as they have done, bring every loyal man throughout the whole South in to save this great Government, bring every man who is to-day raising pork, and corn, and cotton, to fight the battles of the Union, bring every man who can shoulder a musket to crush and utterly destroy this accursed rebellion. Sir, the elements are there, the men are there, the implements are there; we do not need another man from the north of the Potomac. Let us bring the loyal men of the South in to put down treason in the South, and there are men enough and more than enough to do it. Sir, we have heard enough about not using black men to put down this rebellion. I would use locomotives, I would use mules, I would use jackasses, I would use every single thing that God and nature had put in my hands to put down this rebellion; but first I would use the black element, bring every negro soldier who can fight into the Army. A negro, Mr. President, is better than a traitor. I say this advisedly, that I consider a loyal negro better than a secession traitor either in the North or the South. I prefer him anywhere and everywhere that you please to put him. A secession traitor is beneath a loyal negro. I would let a loyal negro vote. I would let him testify; I would let him fight; I would let him do any other good thing, and I would exclude a secession traitor.

Now, Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. I simply got up to make one remark, but I have been led into three or four. I say this deliberately, that in Kentucky, in Tennessee, in Alabama, in Louisiana, in South Carolina, in every single rebel State I consider a loyal negro better than a secession traitor, and I will treat him better. Make the most of it.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. McDUGALL sought the floor, which was awarded to Mr. McDUGALL.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall now take a vote on this measure. We have spent five or six days on it and we shall have no time to devote to it after to-day. I hope we shall certainly finish it to-night.

Mr. McDUGALL. Not with my consent while I have the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from California allow me a minute?

Mr. McDUGALL. Not a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I will wait after you are done. I intend to answer this man. [Pointing to Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] do not, in my judgment, demand a particular reply, but concerning his vehement discourse and its value, if the Senator ever could have been the subject of prophetic vision it might be supposed that an ancient poet and seer had him in his mind's eye when he said or wrote:

"A wise man, when he has occasion fair to speak his mind,
Finds words that promptly flow to grace his argument.
There are those who have the volubility of wisdom
But not her power. A dangerous man
Is that audacious sounding Senator whose loose-cast words
Lack all the qualities of judgment."

We have heard from that Senator many sounding words; no particular thought. He would perform the seven labors of Hercules if words were equivalent to the work; but words are but wind; they have not even the substance of which shadows are made.

I do not intend to discuss this question at length. If time permitted I would be pleased to do so. If I thought anything I could say would be of present practical service I should feel bound to venture upon a careful and full discussion. It is one of immense magnitude. I do not think that the experience, history, or policies of the world ever had to do with such a proposition as is now distinctly presented. It is now proposed that by legislation we shall provide for the particular administration of the personal affairs of four million persons.

Who, Mr. President has ever heard or read of any attempt at such an undertaking? Men who have been dealing with abstractions, the theorists and ismatics of the day, must now look stubborn facts in the face and realize the fact that this is a concrete rather than an abstract world; that conditions exist and must be considered as they exist.

If in regarding abstract speculations more than palpable apprehensible human verities they have evoked a condition more terrible than the tempest, would it not be well if they should pause and inquire how they may control that condition? To me it seems that there is a reckless, headlong disposition to rush wickedly and willfully into ruin. I do not mean that Senators moving this measure advisedly contemplate great wrong, but I am compelled to think that either from prejudice or ignorance they persistently ignore the right. What is evil for all must be evil for them, and ere long they will hear the thunder and witness the lightning.

The daring attempt to control the interests and administer the particular affairs of four million individuals scattered over a large division of a great continent never came within the conception of any reasonable being, without in that category we include the class of mad enthusiasts of the day. The enthusiasts have provoked the occasion, it is well that they should now look it in the face. They have invoked the demon of the threshold. They are not able to command or control his threatening countenance, and they will be compelled to return with trembling.

I have looked for this time, this development of the policy of the Administration. This measure is the full culmination of the policy indicated for the last two years. I have looked for its production with sad apprehension. I have thought that it could not, but I hoped it might be otherwise. And now with an earnest and kind regard for every person whose surface is colored by the hot sun and burning sands of Africa, I say to them, farewell to hope. The bondage of the legislative and governmental tyrants which this policy will inaugurate will be more terrible than that of any system of taskmasters the world has known since Israel was captive in Egypt. For your redemption it will require a Moses and many miracles.

Mr. President, it is impossible for a Government, as such, to administer the particular affairs of four million people. It is a social as well as a mathematical absurdity. Most particularly is this true in a free Government. It is possible under some order of kingship, the king being absolute and crafty. I said it was possible. I withdraw the observation; I do not think it could be done under the ukase of the czar.

Mr. President, the substance, force, and effect of this bill is to not merely subject but to subjugate the African race in all the States in rebellion. They are called freedmen.

Mr. President, the term "freedman" is a delusion. The law forces the so-called freedman beneath the condition of the slave in the South, the peon in Mexico, and the red man of the wilderness. The law if executed is the expression of a merciless power. Let those who propose to extinguish all of African blood give it their support. My love for the entire human family will not permit me to join with them.

Mr. President, I have already remarked that I was a friend to the people of the African race. I am too good a friend to willfully see them wronged. It may be the policy of the friends of this measure to extinguish the African as we have been extinguishing the red men. With the history of the destruction of the aboriginal tribes all are familiar. It may be thought by my humanitarian friends that it would be well to dispose of the African population in the same way. It is a very prompt process. The exact manner I am not familiar with, but I have observed some of the results. In the year 1849 there were in the valley of Napa, the beautiful valley of Napa, twenty-five thousand Indians, quiet, well-ordered, healthy, and strong; there are to-day less than two hundred and fifty, and they the mere wrecks of Indians. What is true of the tribes in the valley of Napa has been true of all the tribes that have come in the way of white oppression since the arrival of Columbus and the war with the Narragansetts.

The policy proposed by this bill is an outrage upon Christianity and humanity, and as such, with a severe sense of duty, I denounce it. A set of Government appointees to command, control, and govern four million people, they to fix the value of their labor, and the surplus over and above the value of their labor to be paid into the Federal Treasury; they to be a special source of Federal revenue. The now slaves being called freedmen are to be placed under hired political taskmasters to make bricks for the Republican tower of Babel. Taskmasters are bad, hired taskmasters are worse, hired political taskmasters are worst. Senators, all pray for the poor negro!

The term "freedman" was a term of value in the old Roman times. It has no value now. Then it indicated the next thing to a Roman citizen; it now indicates the subject of the smallest subaltern. The duty of a soldier and his loyalty are by our law to be ascertained, or rather determined, by the oath he is called upon to affirm.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be an interesting question, not for the first time presented, whether or not an oath has any binding obligations. In the less informed periods of Christian civilization the adjuration which invoked God to witness was held to be a binding obligation. Other theorists may have found out that any oath that promotes a present purpose is justifiable, and is in all respects correct, so that it effects its purpose, and may rely upon Mr. Bentham for authority.

I heard not long since in this Chamber that some gentlemen were afflicted with "Constitution on the brain." Allow me to say that when we come up to the Great Gate and ask for Peter's keys, that Constitution on the brain will not be as dangerous a disease as perjury on the conscience. The Constitution provides "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." This is simple language. It was well understood when it was written, and no man can by any artful conceit deceive himself as to its true meaning. There are men ingenious in trying to deceive themselves, and who being convinced against their will are of the same opinion still, I have met many of them. No system of logic would have any effect upon them as against their foregone conclusions. Here is simple language applied at a particular time, with the history that surrounded it. This history belongs to the present age. The reason why this rule was made is a part of our own almost immediate history, recorded in our own annals, and the language is so plain that he who runs may read. Oaths, I think, are not summer clouds or fleeting shadows, or mere indefinite things. In ancient times the gods were solemnly called upon to bear witness to that which was attested by an oath, and we call upon our own God, and He has been called upon to witness the solemn oath made by every one of us, that we should and will maintain the Constitution of the United States as it came to us from our fathers. This oath we have all taken, and now it is affirmed that there is no binding obligation in an oath; that we may violate an oath as against an enemy in arms, and that we may do it as well in the Senate Chamber as "in the midst of arms." Mr. President is there no such thing as law? Is there no such thing as Christian charity? Is there no such thing as the duty of our offerings to the Most High?

What is the language of the Constitution? "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason." The Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President may declare the punishment of treason; and what is treason? It is the conduct and animus of a traitor, the highest crime known to governmental law. This is language of grant: "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason," but it shall not go beyond a certain extent. The provision then was made for traitors. What more than traitors can you call the men in rebellion? Will some ingenious gentleman who advocates the opposite position find me a word that has ever been used in the English language that will go beyond treason and traitor in describing the status of rebels? The power to punish is granted and limited by the express terms of the Constitution. It is a matter about which there is no room for argument. This provision of the Constitution we have sworn to support. It will be the saddest day of my life, and to me the heavens will be hung with black, when I shall find that Senators can consciously trample upon their oaths, and in this or any other respect trample upon the Constitution. It may be possible that some gentlemen can make it consistent with their views of public policy, but it must be those who believe there is neither a God in heaven, nor truth on earth, nor any just government among men.

Mr. President, I take no pleasure in discussing the pending question; but, sir, I do not feel myself at liberty to let ignorance run wild or to permit presumption to occupy the place of wisdom. Ignorant and ill-advised men have undertaken the administration of a vast policy. By reason of their ignorance and want of proper advice we must all suffer. I will endeavor to bear my share of this suffering; and do my best to induce my fellow-citizens to endure the evils cast and thrust upon them, with the assurance that there will yet be a brighter day. If that day is not found in this land it will be found in that quiet land,

"A place of broad rivers and streams,
Wherein shall go no galley with oars,
Neither shall gallant ship pass thereby."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] has spoken of my applying to him to offer a resolution for the expulsion of my colleague, and he has expressed his regret that he had any agency whatever in placing me in the position formerly occupied by the traitor John C. Breckinridge. I say to that Senator that on that point his regret cannot be half so poignant as mine that he should have had any possible agency under the sun in putting me into this or any other position of honor.

The Senator has alluded to my application to him to offer a resolution for the expulsion of my colleague. I will explain that point. My colleague knows from my information that I left the State of Kentucky under a pledge to move a resolution to that effect. My course in relation to my colleague and the greater light I have since had in relation to his sentiments and principles I distinctly expressed in the Senate some two or three months ago, and I think to his satisfaction. I made a clean bosom of it. When I came to this city my friend and deceased colleague of the other House, Mr. Crittenden, knew the obligation under which I had come before I left the State of Kentucky to offer a resolution for the expulsion of my colleague or have it offered; and Mr. Crittenden informed me that the Senator from Michigan wished to confer with me upon that subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. In obedience to this information from Mr. Crittenden I waited upon the Senator at his room, and he told me that he had been appointed by a meeting to take charge of the case of my colleague, and expressed his willingness to offer the resolution.

The Senator has intimated strongly my disloyalty. Sir, my loyalty is to the Constitution of the United States, not to Abraham Lincoln, or any other living man, whether he is President or not. My oath is not to support Abraham Lincoln, but to support the Constitution of the United States. My obligation, my patriotism, and my office is to support the Constitution, and not Abraham Lincoln who is endeavoring to overthrow it; and in that respect my measure of loyalty is altogether different from and in direct contrast with that of the Senator from Michigan. It is as much my duty, it is as much my sworn obligation, it is as much what I owe to patriotism, to my country, and to the Constitution, to check and defeat and oppose, at least to the extent of my ability, the assaults of Abraham Lincoln upon the Constitution of my country which I have sworn to support as it is for me to resist the attacks of the rebels upon it.

I know that the Senator from Michigan has an entirely different estimate of patriotism, and of support of the Constitution, and of respect and adherence to his oath to support the Constitution. He voted for the Crittenden resolution. His conduct and votes since have falsified every principle and every point in that resolution and in his vote to support it. Sir, men who are familiar with their own infractions of the Constitution, who disregard habitually their obligations to sustain and support it, their oaths to do so, men whose souls are stained with treason to the Constitution and perjury in their oaths to support it, may brand me as a traitor; but no man whose soul is unstained by crimes will make any such aspersion or accusation against me.

The Senator from Michigan says he has been informed by one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives that I have abandoned the principles upon which I was elected. I want the Senator to tell his informant that he is a falsifier, a slanderer, and a poltroon. That informant, that base recreant to truth and honor, was elected upon the platform of Kentucky of 1863. I occupied that platform. I now maintain every principle and every position that I brought with me to the Senate. I maintain every one of the positions in the Kentucky platform. I have none in opposition to it; I have none in addition to it. The base and calumnious informant of the Senator pledged himself deliberately, publicly and repeatedly, to sustain the principles of that platform, and after his election upon those professions and declarations he, with a perfidy that is dishonorable to human nature, betrayed his State and his party and the Constitution of the United States, and disregarded his oath to support it. I want the Senator to make this report to his informant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the Senate in consequence of indisposition. He is sick and confined to his room.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Davis,

Doolittle, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Willey—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Foot, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wade, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, and Willey—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wright—19.

So the bill was passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen."

DAY OF NATIONAL HUMILIATION.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a joint resolution (S. No. 74) requesting the President to appoint a day for national humiliation and prayer; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 154) to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives; and on motion by Mr. WILSON, it was Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. POWELL.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up the bill (H. R. No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that bill will not be taken up. I yielded this morning with the express understanding that the bill for the payment of troops who have been in the service of the country should be taken up next after the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

Mr. WILSON. We can take that up to-morrow morning.

Mr. COWAN. I have no disposition to be factious, but I should like to have that bill taken up.

Mr. WILSON. I have given way for several days past.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is necessary that we should informally go into executive session for the purpose of having some printing ordered. I move therefore to go into executive session.

Mr. WILSON. Let this bill be first taken up. We must have all day to-morrow and the next day for the consideration of military bills.

Mr. COWAN. I think we can as well order the printing of documents in open as in secret session. I see no difficulty about that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARLILE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator will allow us to have a short executive session for the purpose of having a document printed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 28, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, of Boston. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 190) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a commission to select a site for a navy-yard or a naval station on the western waters, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents; and

An act (S. No. 335) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 109, to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution be printed; three thousand for the use of the Institution, and two thousand for the use of the members of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE CENSUS REPORT.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire, by unanimous consent, to make an inquiry. I notice that we have one volume of the census report already printed and delivered. By reading the introduction I discover that it is the purpose of the Superintendent of the Census to have at least five volumes, and perhaps more. It is stated that it is the design of the Superintendent to arrange the several parts so that each of the great interests shall be represented fully and completely by itself. This one is in reference to population; and then there will be one for agriculture, another for manufactures, and so on.

I am ready to concede that the work appears well prepared, but if it is to be extended, involving as it does so large a sum, I submit that it is a question which ought to be decided by Congress and not by the Superintendent. It involves a large outlay of expenditure, much larger than ever before; and if we are to allow it to go on in this way we shall only be able to take a centennial instead of a decennial census. It is now four years since the census was taken, and we have but one volume of the report printed. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether I am correct.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In answer to the gentleman from Vermont, I will say that Mr. Kennedy, the Superintendent, proposes to publish the census report in four volumes:

1. Population, (printed); 2. Agriculture, (in press); 3. Manufactures; 4. Mortality, Education, Taxes, Crime, Wages, Religion.

Mr. MORRILL. The introduction states, if I can understand it, that there are to be five volumes. I think it is as likely to exceed six as to fall below five. I call the attention of the House to the fact and there leave it, so that it may take whatever action it pleases.

Mr. ENGLISH. I hope we will have a report from the Committee on Printing on the subject.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three thousand five hundred extra copies of the report on the New York custom-house be printed for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON NORTHEASTERN DEFENSES.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three thousand extra copies of the report of the special committee on the northeastern defenses be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House two thousand extra copies of the internal revenue bill as it passed, with marginal notes.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate agreed to the amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House No. 494, to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Messrs. FESSENDEN, MORGAN, and POMEROY the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

LOAN BILLS.

Mr. HOOPER. The bill of the House (No. 540) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes, has been returned from the Senate with a few amendments of an unimportant character. I ask that the bill be taken up that we may act upon the amendments of the Senate at this time.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The first amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 4, at the end of line fifteen, add:

Except so far as it may affect the $75,000,000 of bonds already advertised.

Mr. PRUYN. I observe that it is stated in the proceedings of the Senate that the $75,000,000 referred to, I suppose, in this amendment is not exempted from State and Government taxation.

Mr. HOOPER. That is a mistake in the report. This has nothing to do with that subject. It is an amendment to the third section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall impair the right of the States to tax the bonds, notes, and other obligations issued under this act.

I hope that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in with that amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to inquire if this $75,000,000 comes out of the $900,000,000 appropriated by the last Congress, under the act of March 3, 1863, or comes out of the loan of $400,000,000 that is created by this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to modify my amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana in order? Both Houses have acted on the first section of the bill, the last paragraph of which is that all bonds, Treasury notes, and other obligations of the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the amendment is in order, but the point of order should have been made when the amendment was introduced. It was not made, however.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I called for the reading of the proviso for the purpose of making the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The amendment was read audibly by the Clerk; and was debated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] The Chair does not think the amendment is in order, but the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I modify my amendment by adding to it the words "as other property shall be taxed."

The SPEAKER. The amendment is before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I intended certainly to make the point of order before there was any discussion upon it.

Mr. HOOPER. I understood that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] rose only to ask me a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order was made too late. It might have been good at the time the gentleman from Indiana offered the amendment, but the amendment was debated before the gentleman from Illinois called for the reading of it.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Massachusetts will oblige me by answering my question, whether this $75,000,000 loan comes under the $900,000,000 act of the last session, and is to be credited to that, or is it a part of the new loan of $400,000,000 created this session.

Mr. HOOPER. A large portion of this $75,000,000 loan has already been taken.

Mr. BROOKS. When?

Mr. HOOPER. It was issued under the act of last session. I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 77, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Edeu, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazer, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pomerooy, Prayn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perlman, Pike, Alexander B. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashley, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Dumont, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Kasson, King, Knox, McAllister, Morrill, Nelson, Odell, Patterson, Pice, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—34.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the call of the roll, Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that he had paired with Mr. ROGERS.

The first amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

Second amendment:

At the end of the clause, "that the coupon and registered bonds shall be in such form and bear such inscriptions as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and shall be signed by the Register of the Treasury, or for the Register by such person or persons as may be specially designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall bear, as evidence of lawful issue, the imprint of the seal of the Treasury Department, to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a room set apart, especially and exclusively for that purpose, under the care of some person appointed directly by him," add as follows:

And all coupons bearing the engraved signature of the Register of the Treasury in office at the time when such signatures were authorized and engraved, shall have full force, validity, and effect, notwithstanding such Register may have ceased to hold office as such, when issued in connection with bonds duly authorized and signed by or for the successor or successors of said Register.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Strike out all of section eight, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever any bond, Treasury note, or certificate of indebtedness of the United States which shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment, being due, shall be or shall have been claimed by any person or corporation in whose possession the same shall be, by filing a caveat with the Secretary of the Treasury against the payment of the same, the Secretary of the Treasury shall notify such claimant in writing of the fact of such presentation and require him within a reasonable time, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to commence proceedings for the adjudication of the claim before some court of competent jurisdiction, and to transmit a duly certified copy of the bill or complaint to the Secretary of the Treasury. And in case of the failure of such claimant to comply with such requirement, the Secretary of the Treasury shall make payment to the party in possession of and presenting such bond, Treasury note, or certificate of indebtedness, as though no such contesting claim had been made or caveat filed. But this act shall not be construed to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the payment of coupons detached from bonds, by whomsoever presented.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Page 9, line twenty-two, strike out the word "alter" and insert the word "utter."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Page 9, line twenty-three, strike out "alter" and insert "utter."

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Page 9, line twenty-five, strike out "alter" and insert "utter."

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

Page 9, line twenty-six, strike out "alter" and insert "utter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The eleventh section, as amended by the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh amendments, reads as follows:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall falsely make, forge, counterfeit, or utter, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, counterfeited, or altered, any obligation or security of the United States, or shall pass, utter, publish, or sell, or attempt to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or shall bring into the United States from any foreign place with intent to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or shall have or keep in possession, or conceal, with intent to utter, publish, or sell, any such false, forged, counterfeit, or altered obligation, or other security, with intent to deceive or defraud, or shall knowingly aid or assist in any of the acts aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor not exceeding fifteen years, according to the aggravation of the offense.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

At the end of section thirteen add as follows:

Provided further, That the foregoing provision of this section shall not be held or construed to deprive any person of the right to retain in his custody and possession and use for any lawful purpose, any engraved or transferred plate, block, or electrotype, or any die, roll, or other original work as aforesaid, which had been used by him in printing or engraving bank notes or other obligations, before being used—in printing any obligation or other security authorized to be issued by any act of Congress; nor shall any of said foregoing provisions be held or construed to prohibit or restrain the lawful use by any person of any ink, color, or pigment, the exclusive right to which has been secured to any such person by letters patent which are still in force.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out the words, "the right to retain in his custody and possession, and use for any lawful purpose," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any claim to just compensation for."

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that will not be agreed to. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOOPER. The object of that amendment is to secure to the Treasury Department the right to the plates which have been made for them, and which they have paid for. But if the bank note companies have claim on them this provides for them just compensation. The object is to secure the notes against counterfeiters.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the amendment of the Senate will be non-concurred in without amendment. The provision of the House for these fines and imprisonments has been stricken out, and now if the House will concur in this amendment of the Senate I think the bill will be right. These dies used by the bank-note companies, it will be remembered, are not used alone for engraving these Treasury notes; they are used for bank notes for all parts of the world. The printing for the banks of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick is done by the bank-note companies of this country. I hold in my hand a note printed in Greek, for a Greek bank in Athens, the seat of arts, the high court of architecture and skill. Athens pays to this country the high tribute of sending to our artists and using our bank notes and dies. It is an art that should be encouraged.

Here is another of these notes which I wish gentlemen to see. It is printed here for the Bank of Athens, Greece. There are notes printed in the United States in the Russian and Slavonic tongues and other languages. Our artists now have the high honor of printing bank notes for almost all the countries of the earth. The Senate has presented to us an amendment that allows our artists to continue their work. That amendment is right and should pass. It is simply to allow the bank note companies the use of their dies and engravings. If I had supposed this discussion would come up I could have brought to the observation of the House bank notes printed for banks in Canada, Colombia, Peru, Russia, and almost all countries. They send to our bank note companies because the work is performed better by them than anywhere else in the world. It is a high tribute paid to our artists, and the benefit of it should not be taken from them. I hope the Senate amendment will be concurred in without any alteration whatever.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to prolong this discussion. I have two other amendments to offer, one to confine this to the printing of notes and bonds, the other to make compensation to parties who have any interest in patents that are affected by it. I now move to amend by inserting after the word "person" the words "except on notes or bonds."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by inserting at the end thereof the words "and if such ink, color, or pigment shall be used by the United States, such patentee or his assignee shall have just compensation for the same."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out the words "the right to retain in his custody and possession and use for any lawful purpose" and inserting instead thereof "any claim to just compensation for."

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of the Senate; and it was concurred in.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the votes by which the various Senate amendments were disposed of; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Private Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) correcting a clerical error in the award of the emancipation commissioners;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864;

An act (H. R. No. 554) to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane by an exchange of lands;

An act (H. R. No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 519) repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) to declare the construction of a joint resolution for the relief of W. B. Matchett, approved June 20, 1864;

An act (H. R. No. 512) to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves;

An act (H. R. No. 551) to incorporate the Colored Catholic Benevolent Society; and

An act (H. R. No. 539) to incorporate the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Washington.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. A. W. CLARK obtained the floor.

Mr. TODD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a personal explanation?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a personal explanation. On the 11th instant the House decided that I was the legally elected Delegate for the Territory of Dakota after a somewhat extended debate. During this discussion the late sitting Delegate asked and obtained leave of the House to print the speech he had prepared, but which he did not deliver. In that I find the following paragraph, and ask the Clerk to read it:

The Clerk read, as follows:

"As to any personal allusion the contestant has seen proper to make, or any attempt to connect me with any of the fraudulent voting, I have only this to say, that it is wholly false; and I may as well say that I have too much respect for my character to notice, care, or concern myself about any such attempts at slander, coming from a man who resigned his place, so says report, from fear of being dismissed from the Army for cowardice; coming from a man whose name the domestic influence of the White House has three times induced the Executive of the United States reluctantly to send to the Senate for confirmation as a brigadier general, and who has three times met with a prompt refusal by the Senate. I should scorn to notice any personal remarks coming from any one bearing the name of the contestant, (Todd,) a family somewhat notorious for their love of office. If they cannot get office under President Lincoln, they take it under Jeff. Davis."

Mr. TODD. The gentleman waxes very indignant at being charged with bribery or an attempt to connect him with any fraudulent voting, and boldly pronounces the accusation false; yet the proof is conclusive and comes from four different witnesses, in different parts of the Territory, who had no collusion and no motive for false swearing. His denial, unsupported by any evidence, is what might be expected from one detected and exposed as he has been. He took advantage of the indulgence of the House to utter imputations which have no foundation in fact, and which he dared not express in his place, and then had the discretion to leave the city before the Globe containing it was published. At the time it made its appearance I was confined to my room by illness, and, as it has all the merits of a covert and clandestine attack, I have deferred noticing it until I have felt well enough to do so.

He brings a grave charge against me, and bases it upon report. On what report, and how supported? Nothing, absolutely nothing, but the most vague and indefinite rumor, of which he is the author, and to whom the responsibility belongs. The charge is that I resigned from the Army from fear of being dismissed for cowardice. Sir, the good name of a long service in the Army of the country is not, I trust, to be sullied by the malignant voice of detected fraud and disappointed ambition.

Appointed from the State of Illinois, I graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1837. In the fall of that year I joined the Army in Florida, and continued in that arduous and thankless service until 1842, when the Seminole war was closed by General Worth. From that period I served upon the frontiers of Texas and Arkansas, until the campaign opened before Vera Cruz, and only terminated with the fall of the City of Mexico, through which I served. I then on the return of the Army to the United States was stationed on the Upper Mississippi, in Minnesota, until 1854, and in 1855 I took an active part in the campaign of General Harney against the Sioux Indians of the Plains, and in the following year, 1856, when all was peace, I resigned my commission in the Army after twenty years' service, and settled in Dakota, where I have resided ever since.

Let us see what opinion General Harney held of my services during my last campaign previous to my leaving the service; what my record is at the War Department, and how the case stands before the Senate Military Committee touching this infamous charge, which should forever condemn me in the minds of all honorable men if true, or consign to everlasting infamy the man who recklessly makes it if false. I ask the Clerk to read the correspondence which I send to his desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 20, 1864.

SIR: The accompanying extract is taken from a speech of Mr. Jayne, late sitting Delegate for the Territory of Dakota, published in the Globe of the 16th instant, but which was not delivered in the House, he having asked permission to print.

Mr. Jayne left the city before the issue of the Globe.

The attack is so direct and personal that I beg to ask your attention to it, and to inform me whether the charge of cowardice was ever alleged against me either to yourself or the Military Committee, while my name was pending before it for confirmation as a brigadier general, or that the fear of dismissal from the Army on this account was the cause of my resignation.

You will greatly oblige me by an early reply and place me under obligation to you.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. S. TODD.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, United States Senate.

SENATE CHAMBER, June 21, 1864.

SIR: In reply to your note just received, asking me if the charge of "cowardice" was alleged against you when your name was before the Military Committee for confirmation as a brigadier general, or if the fear of "dismissal" from the service on that account was the alleged cause of your resignation, I have to say that I am sure "cowardice" was not alleged against you, nor was it ever represented to the committee that the fear of "dismissal" caused your resignation.

Yours truly,

HENRY WILSON.

Hon. J. B. S. TODD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 20, 1864.

SIR: The inclosed extract is taken from a speech of Mr. Jayne, published in the Globe of the 16th instant, but which was never delivered in the House of Representatives. Mr. Jayne left the city before it made its appearance, and before I had the means of knowing what it contained.

The charge brought against me is a very grave one, and if true, the records of the Adjutant General's office will establish it.

I beg to ask your attention to the marked passage, and to request that you will inform me if such a charge exists against me in your office, or whether the fear of dismissal from the Army for cowardice was the cause of my resignation in the year 1856.

I hope you will be explicit, and will favor me with an early reply.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. S. TODD.

Colonel E. D. TOWNSEND, Assistant Adjutant General,
United States Army, Washington City.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, June 25, 1864.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 20th instant, inclosing a slip from a newspaper, and asking if charges exist against you in this office, or whether the fear of dismissal was the cause of your resignation in 1856, I have respectfully to inform you that I can find no record of any charges against you, and am not aware that any have ever been filed in this office. There is no evidence connected with the record of your resignation to show that it was tendered under any fear or pressure whatever. The regulations of the Army require that when an officer resigns under charges a copy of the charges shall be filed with his resignation. There is certainly no such document with your resignation, nor any evidence that such a one ever existed.

In General Harney's report of the battle with the Indians near Ash Hollow, Sioux country, in September, 1855, you are mentioned with your command in high terms of commendation among "the company commanders whose position, either in the engagement or pursuit, brought them in closest contact with the Indians."

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,

Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. J. B. S. TODD, House of Representatives.

Mr. TODD: I ask the Clerk to read so much of General Harney's report of the battle of Ash Hollow as applies to the charge.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Immediately after his [Little Thunder's] disappearance from my view I ordered the infantry to advance, the leading company [Captain Todd's] as skirmishers, supported by company H, sixth infantry, (under Lieutenant McCleary,) the remaining companies of the sixth being held in hand for ulterior movements. The skirmishers under Captain Todd opened their fire, crowned the bluffs on the right bank of the stream (where the Indians had taken up their last position) in a very spirited and gallant manner, driving the savages therefrom into the snare laid for them by the cavalry."

"The company commanders, whose position either in the engagement or in the pursuit brought them in closest contact with the enemy, were Captain Todd, of the sixth infantry, Captains Steele and Robertson, of the second dragoons, and Captain Heth, tenth infantry."

Mr. TODD: Sir, what can be more conclusive than these letters refuting this charge? And surely the commendation of so eminent and long-tried a soldier as General Harney is worthy of consideration, and should have shielded me from so cruel an accusation. What shall be thought of the man who knowing the truth dares choose the falsehood, and then shirks the responsibility that attaches to all honorable men when they assume a charge, be it true or false? It is true I received the appointment of brigadier general shortly after the breaking out of this cruel internecine war, and accepted it with pride and pleasure. An élève of the Government, educated at its great national school, fostered by its care, and honored with its trusts, I owe all to it, all of manhood I possess, all I am and all I hope to be. In its school were nurtured and cultivated and elevated the germs of loyalty and truth implanted within me under the sacred roof-tree that guarded my youth; under the inspiration of that venerable and venerated old man upon whose head rests the weight of three quarters of a century, and whose deepest reproach would be the dishonor of his son. Inspired by these teachings and holding the sentiments thus early taught and long maintained, I held it my duty to place myself again at the disposition of the Government, and on being ordered to the field repaired to my post with as true a heart and prompt alacrity as any one of the million men who rushed to arms in its defense.

The command of the sixth division of the army of the Tennessee was intrusted to me by the recent and continued by the present Commander-in-Chief of the Army. These eminent soldiers were the companions of my youth and comrades in maturer years; and certainly they are not the men to confide the well-being and safety of an important division to a man who would have been so unworthy of that honor had there been even the semblance of truth attaching to such an atrocious imputation. This command I held until the close of the session of Congress in 1862, when my commission expired by limitation; since which time I have not been in service. The following winter I was again nominated to the Senate, but for reasons known to itself was not confirmed. At the time I was in the field I was also a Delegate to the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and I am the man that Mr. Jayne declared both in Dakota and Springfield, Illinois, should not be confirmed unless I vacated my seat on this floor. I scorned the threat and fell the victim to his vindictiveness. Governor of the Territory, with potential friends and relatives in high places, he brought to bear upon me his boasted power, and only too truly succeeded in carrying out his threats.

The influences used to procure this appointment were simple and quite foreign from those alleged. They were simply a tender of the services of an old soldier, occupied in the avocations of civil life, and accepted by the War Department as generously as they were freely offered. No domestic influences were invoked to urge a reluctant Executive to make the appointment; none other than the desire on either part to render a service to a Government imperiled, and which needed the services of all her sons.

One word in regard to the name I bear and I have done. From the early settlement of Kentucky to the present day it is honored wherever known. On the bloody field of the Blue Licks, where the flower of Kentucky fell, three brothers were engaged and one of them there laid down his life, the eldest, commanding the troops on that disastrous day. From that time until the close of the war of 1812, the representatives of this name were found upon every western battle-field, and the heritage of its glory has been handed down to the younger members as the most priceless boon they could inherit. None of the name have held civil appointments or have been applicants for them in my immediate branch for thirty years. The position I hold is by the voice of the people I represent, and my youngest brother is a soldier in the army operating in Georgia, and in times like these it is certainly no reproach for him to bear arms. But a single branch of this family are in the southern confederacy; three brothers were in its military service, and, however erroneous their opinions may be, it will not be denied that they had the manhood to maintain their opinions, since two of the three have found soldiers graves. Cowards do not seek the posts of danger, and the imputations of this slanderer fall harmless uttered by one upon whose garments the smell of gunpowder has never rested, and upon whose brow the dishonor of a blow remains unredressed.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I now resume the floor and offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House eight thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the Senate on the 12th of March, 1863, relating to our foreign and domestic commerce, including as well that of the Pacific coast.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the unfinished business on which the House was engaged last evening, being the conscription bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House last evening disagreed to the proposition of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] on the enrollment bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BEAMAN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 85, not voting 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dehson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutcheson, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kerban, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, McKimney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Brannan, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Dumont, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hall, Kasson, King, Price, Rogers, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhies, Wheeler, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—24.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BLAINE stated that when the vote was taken last evening on the substitute offered by Mr. SMITHERS, he was paired with Mr. PIKE; that he (Mr. BLAINE) would have voted against it, while Mr. PIKE would have voted for it.

Mr. BLAIR. I move the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

ARMY NEWS.

The Speaker laid before the House for information the following communication from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 28, 1864.

SIR: A dispatch from General Grant, dated yesterday, 27th, 3.30 p. m., at his Headquarters, reports no operations in front, except from our own guns, which fire into the bridge at Petersburg from a distance of two thousand yards. The dispatch gives the following intelligence from rebel papers:

"A Petersburg paper of the 25th states that Hunter is striking for Jackson River Depot, about forty miles north of Salem, and says that if he reaches Covington—which they suppose he will do—with most of his forces, but with loss of material, he will be safe.

"The same paper accuses Hunter of destroying a great amount of private property and stealing a large number of wagons, horses, and cattle.

"The same paper also states that Wilson destroyed a train of cars loaded with cotton and furniture, burned the depot building, &c., at Burkesville, and destroyed some of the track, and was still pushing south. All the railroads leading into Richmond are now destroyed, and some of them badly."

A dispatch from General Sherman, received this morning, reports that yesterday (June 27) an unsuccessful attack was made by our forces on the enemy's positions, which resulted in a loss to us of between two and three thousand. The following particulars are now given:

"Pursuant to my orders of the 24th, a diversion was made on each flank of the enemy, especially down the Sandtown road, at 8 a. m. McPherson attacked at the south-west end of Kenesaw, and Thomas at a point about a mile farther south, at the same time. The skirmishers and artillery along the whole line kept up a sharp fire.

"Neither attack succeeded, though both columns reached the enemy's works, which are very strong. McPherson reports his loss about five hundred, and Thomas about two thousand. The loss is particularly heavy in general and field officers. General Harker is reported mortally wounded; also, Colonel Dan. McCook, commanding a brigade; Colonel Rice, fifty-seventh Ohio, very seriously. Colonels Barnhall, fortieth Illinois, and Augustine, fifty-fifth Illinois, are killed.

"McPherson took one hundred prisoners, and Thomas about as many, but I do not suppose we inflicted heavy loss on the enemy, as he kept close behind his parapets."

No other military intelligence has been received by the Department.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 121) for the relief of Lieutenant William P. Richner, seventy-seventh regiment Ohio volunteer infantry;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to release certain parties from liabilities or payment of duties;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

The question recurred on reconsidering the vote by which the House rejected the amendment offered by Mr. SMITHERS.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 71, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smathers, Spalding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upton, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—83.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kallbelsch, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Cox, Dumont, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Kasson, Kernan, King, Morrill, James R. Morris, Price, Rogers, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—28.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BROOKS stated that he was paired off with Mr. MORRILL, who was absent on a conference committee.

The question recurred on agreeing to Mr. SMITHERS's substitute.

Mr. SMITHERS. Before the question is put to the House, I desire to make a slight modification of the first section of my substitute. I move to insert after the word "service," in the last line, the words "in the line of his duty." The effect of that modification will be to require that the party shall have been wounded or that his disease shall have been incurred in the line of his duty.

Now, sir, I have no desire to discuss this question. I suppose the proposition is well understood by every gentleman upon this floor. The alteration I have made in my substitute is a plain and simple one, and in order that the question may be at once taken upon the substitute I demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion to him before he demands the previous question?

Mr. SMITHERS. Gentlemen around me generally desire that the question shall be taken at once. I must, therefore, decline to yield.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like to have an opportunity to offer a small amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Delaware allow me to ask him a single question about his substitute?

Mr. SMITHERS. I cannot do it.

Mr. THAYER. I would inquire whether, if the previous question is sustained, it will be competent to move to add a section to the bill as amended?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the House should adopt the substitute. It will not be in order to strike out any part of it, but it will be in order to add additional sections.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and SMITHERS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 75, not voting 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smathers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upton, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—81.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kallbelsch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Dumont, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Hall, Kasson, King, Morrill, Odell, Price, Rogers, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—25.

So the substitute offered by Mr. SMITHERS was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. McKINNEY stated that Mr. Cox had paired off with Mr. FENTON.

Mr. BROOKS stated that he had paired with Mr. MORRILL.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. SMITHERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to alter or in any way affect the law relative to those conscientiously opposed to bearing arms.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the previous question on the amendment to the bill. Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LAZEAR and McBRIDE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 70.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 78, not voting 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smathers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upton, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kallbelsch, Kernan, Knapp, Lazear, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Ross, Seofield, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Blaine, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Dumont, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hall, Kasson, King, Law, Le Blond, Morrill, Leonard Myers, Price, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Sweet, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—31.

So the House refused to order the main question, and the bill and amendments were therefore relieved of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move the previous question on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the amendment by adding as follows:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter, persons between the ages of forty-five and fifty years shall be enrolled and subject to draft in the same manner as persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROLLINS of New Hampshire, and MIDDLETON, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 63.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, called for tellers on ordering the main question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAWES, and O'NEILL of Ohio, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 62.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being on Mr. Pike's amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. I suggest a modification to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not amendable.

Mr. PIKE called for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 102, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Blow, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chaffee, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Garfield, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Littlejohn, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Nelson, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Smith, Stevens, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, and Chilton A. White—47.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finch, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jencks, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Perham, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cox, Dumont, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Hall, Herrick, Kasson, King, Lazear, Morrill, Price, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—33.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. Will this amendment enable everybody who is opposed to the war to become exempt? Will it apply to peace Democrats?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

Mr. MALLORY. Then it is a question of information. I want to know.

The SPEAKER. The question is in the nature of debate.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 64, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Chaffee, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, Fenton, Finch, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Loan, McAllister, McClurg, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Perry, Pike, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Wilder, Wilson, and Winfield—79.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, English, Garfield, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Tracy, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Williams—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hall, William Johnson, Kasson, King, Lazear, Mallory, McBride, Morrill, Nelson, Odell, Patterson, Price, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Voorhees, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been engrossed, and goes therefore to the Speaker's table.

ADMIRALTY PROCEEDINGS.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the bill of the House (No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the enrollment bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 154, to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and report the bill back to the House.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of the military appointments of Mr. Blair and Mr. SCHENCK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only call up the report by unanimous consent, two matters of business being already before the House.

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be no objection to this report being called up now. I propose to call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I desire to know if the admiralty bill cannot be called up now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair called it up, but the gentleman from Ohio called up a question of higher privilege—a motion to reconsider. If there be no objection the resolution of the Committee of Elections will be reported and voted on as if under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT—AGAIN.

The question recurred on Senate bill No. 154, to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, with the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the amendments are some thirty-odd in number, and before they are read perhaps the House should have some explanation of them.

The first amendment is to strike out the words "under such rules as may be prescribed by the Quartermaster General, with the approval of the Secretary of War," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "under the direction of the Quartermaster General;" so that it will then provide—

"That there shall be established in the office of the Quartermaster General of the Army, to exist during the present rebellion and one year thereafter, the following divisions, each of which shall be placed in the charge of a competent officer of the quartermaster's department, to be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of War, who shall, under the direction of the Quartermaster General, transact the business of such division as hereinafter provided, &c.

The object of that is to leave the Quartermaster General at the head of his department as now, with a general supervision on the part of the Secretary of War, without calling on the Secretary of War for assignment of each officer who is to serve at the head of any division in that department.

The Committee on Military Affairs propose to strike out the second section of the Senate bill, for whatever is provided in that section is contained in other sections of the bill, with this difference: that section provides that "such officers of the quartermaster's department so authorized to make purchases, shall not inspect, measure, weigh, or receive the articles purchased or contracted for by them, but such inspecting, measuring, weighing, and receiving, shall be performed by the quartermasters attached to the commands or depots for whose use the articles are purchased or contracted for." The effect of that will be to render it difficult, impossible even, to carry out the law under which supplies can be furnished at all to the Army. It will prevent contracts and prevent competition. For instance—and I can explain myself better by illustration—if a quartermaster purchases supplies from a contractor at Cincinnati, that contractor furnishes them to the officer at the point where they are to be sent, so that the contractor would have to wait until they went down to Chattanooga or Marietta or some other distant point, and would have no settlement, no payment, no adjustment of his contracts, and there would be no adjustment of the quartermaster's own accounts until return was made from the inspector at one of those points.

The only argument in favor of the Senate bill in this particular is that it may be said here is a check, the purchase being made at one place and the inspection at another. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House have thought the only proper way is to secure the good conduct under proper inducements and proper penalties of the officers themselves. They have extended to inspectors the penalties which apply to other officers. They are held liable to trial by court-martial, and punishable in the same way as contractors. This has not been the case in regard to inspectors. It leaves the inspectors to act and exercise their functions at the places where the purchases are made. They are held to a stricter accountability, and these checks are thrown around them.

In the third section it will be discovered that the word "by" is stricken out and the words "under the direction of" inserted. This may seem to be an unimportant amendment, as it is merely to strike out a single word and insert four others; but instead of being unimportant it is the key to all of the amendments proposed by the committee of the House to the Senate bill. That bill contemplates the idea that the head of each division in the quartermaster's department shall live here at Washington, where all the purchases are to be made. In other words, the scope of the Senate bill is for centralizing the whole matter at Washington. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House believe, and they have come to that conclusion after conference with the Quartermaster General, who agrees with them, that centralization in Washington will be to build up a great monopoly or controlling company to supply everything, and which would put down every sort of competition. They have preferred, therefore, instead of this centralizing system which the Senate bill contemplates, to rely on the system which now prevails of having the purchases made near the places where the farmers bring in their supplies. The drovers, and those who raise or are the purchasers of cattle, will have convenient access to those who make contracts, and they may have an interest in contracts of small amount without being subject to the overshadowing influence of central monopolies which would take possession of the whole system at the seat of Government.

The Committee on Military Affairs regarded this as a very important change in the general features and principles of the bill, and if gentlemen will take the trouble to run through the bill, they will find that most of the amendments of the Senate merely provide for the restoration of that principle by which contracts and purchases may be made near the place of production. This attempt to centralize the whole matter here as the Senate bill would do is broken up; in other words I might say that the tendency of the Senate bill is centripetal, while the tendency of the amendments of the House committee are centrifugal. We wish to drive off professional contractors and to get contracts where the farmers and producers and manufacturers of goods can enter fairly into competition with others, and where they will not be subjected to the overshadowing and grasping power of any central company that may be built up at the seat of Government. Following up that idea, in the latter part of the same section it is provided that depot quartermasters shall retain the contracts, but they are required to report all contracts to the head of division and to keep a check hereafter on all contracts that may be made; not only the contracts, but all the bids are to be sent here, so that in case it is alleged in regard to any contract that there has been unfairness in opening the bids, or that there has been something corrupt or wrong in the manner in which the contract has been made, the thing can be traced and discovery effectually made. The Senate propose that all contracts shall be made here, and that all outstanding contracts shall be sent here. The House committee prefer a middle course; and that is that there shall be an opportunity to all citizens who have supplies to furnish to furnish them near the place where they live, and without competition with the large and overshadowing monopolies here at the center. The officer making the contract is not only required to report the contract, but to report every bid and proposal made to the quartermaster's department here, so that we will have on file every portion of the testimony and all parts of the evidence which go to show how, when, and with whom any particular contract was made. We have thought it very advisable that this sort of check should be held, so that any investigation demanded by Congress or by the Department might be made.

There is one other amendment to which I desire to direct the attention of the House, and it is to be found in section seven, on page 12. We propose to insert a section there to cure this evil: as matters now stand, every contractor for furnishing supplies for the Army is liable to be tried for any fraud or corruption. What has been the custom? A contractor makes a contract, and then shuffles it out of his hands, and, although contracts are not legally assignable, yet the Department have been accustomed to permit other persons, assignees or those who have got possession of the contracts, to fill the contracts.

Now, when it is discovered that there is something fraudulent in the manner in which a contract has been filled by a United States contractor, he replies, "I have no interest in it whatever; I made a contract, it is true, but I have committed no fraud and incurred no punishment as a fraudulent contractor." You must go to the person who undertook to fill the contract, and he will say, "I am not a contractor of the Government, and do not come under the provisions of your law; and therefore, whatever fraud I may have committed, I am not responsible for it under your law."

This amendment, as proposed by the committee, provides that all persons who have become the assignees of contractors, or others who undertake the filling of contracts, shall be held liable for frauds committed, the same as contractors. Now, it has been one of the crying evils of the times that men, either through political influence or in reward for political services, have had contracts awarded to them when it was well known that they would go out and resell those contracts. I have known an instance—it has come before the Military Committee of the House at this session of Congress—where an Illinois lawyer contracted to deliver several hundred thousand bushels of corn. He broke up his contract into little fragments of some hundred thousand each. The contractor had probably never bought or sold a grain of corn in his life. He did not get his contract with any view of ever filling it. But he went out and found a number of produce purchasers who could fill such a contract; and he transferred his contract to them for a bonus from each of some eight or nine hundred dollars. And this very Congress has voted to reimburse one of these innocent persons to the tune of two or three thousand dollars, to make good his loss by a contract which should never have been made, or if made should never have been assigned, or if assigned should have been followed with all the consequences of non-fulfillment.

The tenth section provides that the Secretary of War is to designate the newspapers in which advertisements for bids are to be published. The Committee on Military Affairs thought it best to strike that out, because there is no special reason for such a provision unless it be for the purpose of political patronage. The best way is to allow the quartermasters to go on and publish advertisements for bids in papers of the largest circulation, without leaving it to the Secretary of War or any one else to designate what papers they are to be published in.

There are a number of other amendments which explain themselves. I will answer any question that may be put to me, and give any further explanation. The committee recommends the striking out of the thirteenth section, and has introduced a section providing for a graduation of the rank and pay of persons in the quartermaster's department of the Government. That provision seems to be a fair one. It allows a quartermaster for a large army, consisting of various Army corps, or for a military district, consisting of different departments, to have the rank of brigadier general. The quartermaster of an army in the field, consisting of two Army corps, is to have the rank of colonel. Quartermasters for only one corps are to rank as they do now, as lieutenant colonel. Quartermasters of divisions are to rank as majors, and all others as captains. If, for instance, a quartermaster serving with the rank of captain is assigned to the charge of a division or corps, his rank is increased from the time at which he commences to perform such service. The moment he is relieved and ceases to perform these services he falls back again to his lineal rank; that is, to his rank as quartermaster proper. The object is to afford, in the first place, distinctive grades of rank with a view to the proper government of the quartermaster's department. Another and very important object is to save to the service a large number of quartermasters, who are now daily resigning, because, having entered at the commencement of the war, and having no chance of getting above the grade of captain, with its comparatively small pay, they are not willing to hold such position, exercising such important functions, and with the immense responsibility of disbursing millions of property, without corresponding rank or compensation.

To show that there is no mistake in this, I have a communication received yesterday from the War Department on the subject of the resignation of quartermasters. Sixty-seven quartermasters, many of them the best in the Army, with the rank of captain, have been forced to resign since the month of February last; and many others are but holding back to see if there is to be no change in the present system.

But, passing on from this point, the committee have in one respect enlarged somewhat the scope of the bill as it came from the Senate. They have been impressed with the large proportion of officers in the regular Army who are assigned to these more important positions of quartermaster. Since the commencement of this war, with rare exceptions, all the quartermasters holding positions of any considerable importance have been from the regular Army. It has been considered essential that a man should be educated at West Point before he is able to pass upon and purchase clothing, whisky, or corn. He must have had an education at West Point before he is able to purchase horses or contract for cattle. And so with various other things.

Now, sir, it is well known that in the present organization of the Army those from the regular Army form a very small proportion of the whole body of quartermasters and commissaries. Nobody will pretend to deny that there are men in the volunteer corps who, from their commercial education and their habits of business long before as well as since their connection with the service, are as well if not better qualified to judge of all these articles than those who have received a military education exclusively.

We have provided, therefore, in our amendments to this bill that the assignments to these different positions, as quartermaster of divisions, armies, Army corps, &c., shall be at least two thirds from the volunteer corps. That proportion is not at all comparable to the aggregate number of quartermasters from the volunteer corps with those of the regular Army. In other words, we provide that of the quartermasters assigned to divisions, corps, &c., a certain number of whom now have the rank of lieutenant colonel, not more than one third shall be from the regular Army.

I have now gone hastily through the most important of the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I am ready, however, to answer any inquiries which gentlemen may see fit to make in regard to them.

Mr. TODD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Military Committee why it is that he has put in a proviso limiting the number of quartermasters who shall be staff officers to a particular corps. The gentleman has had some experience in military affairs, and surely that experience has taught him that it is better to leave the selection of the staff officers of a department or Army corps to the commanding officer or to the Secretary of War or to the President of the United States rather than to undertake on the part of Congress to say they shall be selected from a particular class.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman, for I desire to be distinctly understood in regard to this matter. A law was passed by the last Congress providing for the appointment of an extra number of staff officers in the commissary department, reorganizing that department, giving increased rank to the head of the department, with rank to his subordinates, running down to the grade of captain. Well, sir, when that law came to go into operation it seemed to have been the opinion of the appointing power that no man was fit to discharge the duties of commissary unless he had had a West Point education, and all the patronage under that law was bestowed exclusively upon officers of the regular Army.

Now, inasmuch as the regular Army does not muster anything like one third the quartermasters in the entire Army, and inasmuch as these officers are only to continue in office for the war, and these volunteer officers are in for the war, it has been thought that, while giving the privilege of selecting one third of the quartermasters from the regular Army, it is but a small favor to ask that two thirds shall be taken from among the skilled officers of the volunteer corps, who number, I suppose, not less than ten to one of the regulars. And it is with a view to control by legislation of Congress the assignment of these officers that this amendment is reported. I state frankly to the gentleman that I do desire that Congress shall prescribe, not that particular persons shall be selected, but shall prescribe certain limits within which the assignment shall be made.

Mr. TODD. It is a very singular assertion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that Congress or this House should prescribe to the Executive of the Government who its appointees shall be. It is certainly in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which places that power in the hands of the Executive of the United States. It makes an invidious distinction. There can be no doubt that the Executive of the Government of the United States and the head of the War Department, with all the lights before them, are the best judges of who shall be the purchasers of Army supplies, and who shall be disbursing officers of the Government. Members of Congress do not know who these men are or their qualifications or fitness for the appointments. It is an invidious distinction which takes from the Executive and the War Department the just powers conferred upon them by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. Congress does not attempt to indicate to the Executive who the appointees shall be. They do not indicate the individuals, but leave him with the whole corps of volunteers and with the whole corps of quartermasters in the regular Army to select from. They only provide that in making selections he shall make the selections from particular corps. To indicate the appointees is to prescribe the particular individuals. The committee all say that would be wrong, and they do not undertake to say who shall be appointed, but only that those appointments shall be made within particular limits constituting the great body of the Army. It is most liberal to the regular Army.

Mr. TODD. I understand the point the gentleman makes. In this instance the appointments are limited to two branches of the service. But who better know how to make these appointments than the President himself? This bill imposes upon the President a delicate task, and there should be no limitation to the appointing power. If the proposition prevails that one third of these men are to be appointed from the regular Army and two thirds from the volunteer forces, at once you limit the appointing power, and thus cut off men who would otherwise be the proper persons to be appointed.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to offer an amendment to the seventh section of the bill by adding a proviso. The seventh section, which is itself an amendment recommended by the committee, very properly extends the provisions of the act passed July 17, 1862. What I desire is, to add this proviso:

Provided, That any person arrested for a violation of the provisions of this section, and of the act to which it is an addition, shall be admitted to bail to answer the charges made against him before any court-martial constituted to try him, in such sums and with such sureties as shall be designated and approved by any judge of the district court where the arrest is made or the offense charged to have been committed, or any commissioner appointed by such court.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is already a general bill providing for that.

Mr. DAWES. No such bill has passed into a law. It may have passed this House, but I am confident it has not passed both Houses, because of certain experience I have had in attempting to procure bail for certain gentlemen arrested in a most remarkable manner, under the provisions of that act, and I am informed that those gentlemen are to be admitted to bail or not at the caprice of those who arrested them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no particular objection to the amendments. I demand the previous question upon the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to dispense with the evening session for this evening.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 61.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I will say that I think all objection will be withdrawn on this side to the engrossment of the enrollment bill. We have no disposition to postpone action on the subject.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who entered the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the abolition of slavery throughout all the States and Territories of the United States, proposes to call that motion up during the present session.

Mr. ASHLEY. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that I do not propose to call up that motion during the present session. When I changed my vote from yea to nay and entered a motion to reconsider, I did hope to get a vote upon the proposition at this session. I did think that on the other side, on sober second thought, gentlemen enough on that side of the House could be brought to support this just constitutional amendment to carry it, but I have been disappointed. Those who ought to have been the champions of this great proposition are unfortunately its strongest opponents. They have permitted the golden opportunity to pass. The record is made up, and we must go to the country on this issue thus presented. When the verdict of the people is rendered next November I trust this Congress will return determined to ingraft that verdict into the national Constitution. I therefore give notice to the House and the country that I will call up this proposition at the earliest possible moment after our meeting in December next.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let us pass the enrollment bill and then adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to dispense with the evening session for this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to dispense with the evening session.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK called up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the conscription bill to be engrossed, and then withdrew it.

The bill being actually engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 77, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Bartter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brannan, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Feunton, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knorr, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Winfield—83.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerston, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Henry Winter Davis, Dumont, Grinnell, Hall, Harrington, Kasson, King, Price, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Starr, Stebbins, Voorhees, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—23.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCOTT stated that he was paired with Mr. PRICE, otherwise he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague Mr. ROGERS was paired with Mr. A. W. CLARK.

Mr. FARNSWORTH stated that on the previous votes he was paired with his colleague, Mr. J. C. ALLEN; and that on the latter vote, Mr. ALLEN was paired with Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland.

Mr. KNAPP stated that his colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, had been called from the House by the illness of Senator RICHARDSON; and that if present he would have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to take up and non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the Union Pacific railroad bill, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

JAMES DOTY.

Mr. GANSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war investigate the charge contained in the petition of James Doty relating to the treatment of himself and other persons arrested as alleged deserters.

ADMIRALTY PROCEEDINGS.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes, laid over as unfinished business from a previous day, on which Mr. MORRIS, of New York, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Pacific railroad bill, in order to disagree with the Senate amendments, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FOSTER, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 497) in relation to the village of Deposit, Delaware county, New York; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 23) for the relief of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. No. 67) for the relief of Thomas J. Galbraith.

ALEXANDER CROSS.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table joint resolution for the relief of Alexander Cross, for the purpose of concurring in an unimportant amendment of the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, objected, and moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty minutes, p.m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. G. H. SMYTH, of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

IRON-CLAD GUNBOATS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire what progress has been made in the construction of the iron-clad steam gunboats contracted for in the year 1862; by whom the contract was made on the part of the Government; who planned the models of the same, and who is responsible therefor. Have any of them been launched? If so, what was the condition of the vessel after she was launched? Are the other vessels contracted for to be built on a plan or model similar to the Chino lately launched at Boston? And all information which may be had touching said gunboats.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no petitions, reports from committees are in order.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 244, to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been overthrown a republican form of government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are in order.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 394) for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 319) for the relief of the legal representative of Betsey Nash, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 442) to grant a pension of eight dollars per month to Harris Welch, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the Adams Express Company, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 337) authorizing the payment to the Adams Express Company of the amount of certain Treasury notes destroyed or irrecoverably lost while in their custody. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles A.

Pitcher, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 338) for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

LAND LOCATIONS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the bill (H. R. No. 435) concerning certain locations of lands in the State of Missouri and recommend its passage; and as it is a local matter of no general concern, and will probably excite no contest, I ask to have it put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of the lands within the respective boundaries of certain described locations in township forty-five north of the base line, in range seven east of the fifth principal meridian line, in the State of Missouri, made by virtue of certificates issued under the act of Congress approved February 17, 1815, entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquakes," shall be granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the United States, in fee simple and in full property, to the persons or their respective legal representatives in whose names the locations were severally made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print five thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the value and present condition of our foreign and domestic commerce, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th of March, 1863, a statistical and general report upon the value and condition of our foreign and domestic commerce, be printed; that five thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, and that two thousand five hundred copies be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

COTTON SPECULATIONS BY MILITARY OFFICERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print the report made by the military commission, of which Major General Irwin McDowell was president, on certain alleged frauds in the Western department, to report it back without amendment, and recommend that it pass, and also to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection to its consideration, but I am opposed to its passage, and I wish to state the reason.

Mr. COWAN. If it leads to debate I shall object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it had better be disposed of now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before we pass from the subject of that resolution, I feel it to be due to a very gallant officer of the State of Indiana, Colonel Slack, of the forty-seventh regiment, to say that I understand in the papers accompanying the report of that investigation he is charged to have been connected with some cotton speculations. I have known Colonel Slack for a number of years, and a desire to make gain is no part of his character so far as I have known him. I believe him to be a high-minded and honorable gentleman, as he has proved himself to be a very gallant officer. I introduce this subject for the purpose of enabling my colleague to have one or two letters read to the Senate, that those letters may go to the country in connection with this report. They cannot, of course, be printed with the report, but they can go upon the records of the Senate and thus go to the country. I yield to my colleague for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the resolution having been passed over, nothing in relation to it can be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume, as this affects the character of a very gallant officer, no Senator will object to it. To read the letters will not occupy more than a few minutes.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. My only object is to have two letters read which will show that great injustice has been done to Colonel Slack of my State by the report of this commission of which General McDowell was president.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana desires unanimous consent to make an explanation and read the letters he proposes to read. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Senate, by unanimous consent, will give us an opportunity to dispose of this whole question now. There are other officers implicated in the same way with Colonel Slack, many of whom have been killed gallantly fighting for the country since this report was made, who never knew that there was the slightest breath of slander uttered against them in this connection, and I want to have this whole thing disposed of in justice to the other officers as well as to Colonel Slack.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the Senator from Indiana making his explanation?

Mr. GRIMES. And having the question disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not before the Senate. Objection was made to the consideration of the resolution, and that has passed away.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the matter cannot be considered.

Mr. COWAN. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from California to make the objection.

Mr. CONNESS. If the question can be decided without debate I shall not object, but if it is going to occupy the morning hour I shall.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I shall not debate it, but I wish to have two letters read in vindication of a gallant officer who is aspersed by that report. The telegraphic account of it has gone all over the country implicating him in these cotton speculations. I wish simply to have his letter read and the letter of his commanding general, which show that great injustice has been done to him.

Mr. CONNESS. If it be understood that it will not be debated, but considered without debate, I have no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no doubt the investigation was as fairly conducted as under the circumstances it could be; but it was ex parte in its nature. Men were charged who were miles off on distant service and knew nothing whatever of the charges against them until telegraphic reports were sent all over the country that they were implicated in cotton speculations. I shall oppose the printing of any such ex parte report as this, and I ask to have these two letters read as part of my speech to show the reason why no such report should be printed by the Senate and go out with the sanction of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the following letters:

CARROLLTON, LOUISIANA, June 17, 1864.

Sir: My attention has just been called to the publication of what purports to be an extract from the report of the McDowell investigating committee. One publication says it was established before that committee that "Colonel Slack, forty-seventh Indiana volunteers, was engaged in cotton speculations." Another is, "Colonel Slack, forty-seventh Indiana volunteers, captured some silver-ware in Mississippi, which Mrs. Cogswell complained had not been all returned." I quote from memory, and may not use the precise language as published, but the idea. Were the quotations given ordinary newspaper flings they would receive no attention from me, but they purport to be given to the country in a more reliable form, and come to me in a shape that I hardly know how to meet them. That they are false in every particular, not the remotest shadow to justify, mitigate, or excuse such a conclusion, I can most truthfully say, and ask you in some shape in my behalf to so say before the Senate of the United States, and challenge the most rigid and searching investigation. I venture the expression without the fear of contradiction, there is not an officer in the Army with whom I have served but that will say the first they ever heard of such charges were the publications I have referred to. I never had, directly nor indirectly, anything to do with a fiber of cotton in my life, and if anything was testified to before that committee implicating me therein, it was as base perjury as was ever uttered from a lying scoundrel's throat. The matter in reference to the silver-ware was simply this: I was put in command of three companies of infantry and one section of artillery to visit the town of Commerce, Mississippi, about fifty miles below Memphis, on the Mississippi river, arrest all the men I could find, and burn the town. It was known to be a harbor for guerrillas, and they had the day before fired into the steamer Mill Boy, killed Dr. Lindsay of Memphis, a soldier from Wisconsin, I think, and wounded one or two others. I acted as directed, burned the town, and arrested every man found within two miles.

Some property was captured. Along with it was the box of silver ware alluded to. I did not see it. Was taken possession of by an officer of my company, and I was asked what he should do with it. I ordered him to take charge of it and keep it safely, that it was private property, and unless it was subject to confiscation would have to be returned to the owner. Subsequently it was stolen from the lieutenant who had it in charge, and when Mrs. Cogswell came for it the lieutenant was unable to produce it. Afterwards it was discovered, having been taken by a sergeant in company B of the forty-seventh regiment, and buried in the ground. Was dug up and placed in my possession for safe keeping, the first time I ever saw it, and in a few days was restored to Mrs. Cogswell just in the form that I received it. Whether any of it was taken before it reached me, I cannot say. It was understood by those who knew Mrs. Cogswell that no reliance could be placed in anything she might say; was a bitter rebel, and wholly unreliable. I have given you a general idea of the matter hurriedly written, and ask you in my behalf to place the matter before the Senate and the country in some shape that will vindicate me against the slanderous outrage. Had I been summoned before that committee I could have explained the whole thing, but never knew until the publication I have referred to that my conduct in any particular was to be criticised by it. Permit me to ask you to show this to Mr. Hendricks, and between you do whatever you may think best to perfectly vindicate me from the foul and false aspersion. General McGinnis, who was with me all the time at Helena, and constantly with me for the past two years, has promised me a letter to you which I will enclose if it reaches me in time. Shall anxiously wait to hear from you and learn the result of your action.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. R. SLAOK,

Colonel Forty-Seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers.
Hon. HENRY S. LANE.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, June 17, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I notice in the papers that the McDowell cotton court has implicated Colonel J. R. Slack, of the forty-seventh Indiana, in cotton speculations at Helena, Arkansas. I was very much astonished at this, from the fact that during an association of two years with him in the Army I have never heard him accused or suspected of having had anything to do with cotton.

I am fully satisfied that this charge has been trumped up against Colonel Slack for the purpose of shielding and withdrawing attention from larger game.

I do not believe that Colonel Slack could have engaged in that business and have kept it secret from all the Indiana officers stationed at Helena at that time.

Among the Indiana officers at Helena during the time that the heavy cotton operations were going on, were Brigadier General A. P. Hovey, Colonel Conrad Baker, first cavalry; Colonel Shunk, eighth Indiana; Colonel Washburn, eighteenth; Colonel Spieck, twenty-fourth; Colonel Cameron, thirty-fourth; Colonel McLean, forty-third; Colonel Fitch and Bringham, forty-sixth; Colonel Slack, forty-seventh; and myself, of the eleventh. I met these officers frequently, and we hardly ever met without discussing the merits of officers reported to be engaged in cotton speculations, and they were generally very well known. During all of our discussions upon that subject the name of Colonel Fitch was the only one that was ever mentioned of Indiana officers who were engaged in speculations of any kind, and it was generally understood and believed that no other Indiana officer was so engaged, especially no other Indiana colonel.

Colonel Slack could not have engaged in cotton speculations without some of us knowing something about it. I believe that every officer whose name I have mentioned will sustain me in the above assertion.

In regard to the silver-ware said to have been captured by Colonel Slack, and "all of which has not been returned," I never heard of the affair until a few days since I read of it in the papers in connection with the cotton speculations. Upon inquiry, I am reminded of an expedition, under Colonel Slack, to a point between Helena and Memphis, with orders to burn certain houses in the neighborhood, as a punishment to the residents for permitting our boats to be fired upon by the rebels. The box of ware was taken from the burning house by an officer under Slack's command, and without his knowledge. It was brought to Helena, and kept by the officer, until claimed by the pretended owner, when it was returned through Colonel Slack's headquarters.

The fact that the woman claiming the silver-ware bore a notoriously bad character is sufficient, in my opinion, to give the lie to her assertion that the whole of it had not been returned.

Colonel Slack has always proved himself a faithful, earnest, and patriotic officer. I believe that gross injustice has been done him by the McDowell court, and as it is almost impossible at this time to organize a court composed of officers who were at Helena at the time and acquainted with the facts, who would, I have no doubt, acquit him of all such charges, I think that he should have the benefit of a public denial in open Congress, and I know of no man better able to do justice in the matter than yourself, provided you believe Colonel Slack guiltless.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. F. MCGINNIS,
Brigadier General Volunteers.

Hon. H. S. LANE, United States Senate.

Before the reading was concluded,
Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to dispense with the further reading of these papers. It seems to me that it will not do to bring in papers of this character to be read to the Senate at this stage. Every officer in the Army will be sending letters here.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will the Senator from Illinois pardon me? The letters are read as part of my speech on this resolution to print, and I have a right to have them read, and go into the Globe, and that was my object in having them presented to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that they were being read as part of the Senator's speech. I suppose he has a right to read as part of his speech what he pleases. I was not aware that they came in that shape. But the Senator from Indiana will perceive what the result will be. I get many letters complaining, and if I have them read, every officer, the moment it is learned that such a practice prevails, of course will send his defense here. It will lead to very great abuse, I think. I was not aware the Senator was making a speech, and having letters read as part of his speech. I concede his right to do that.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is not only a part of my speech, but all of my speech, and I sent them up to be read, because the Clerk could read quicker than I could.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If these papers are the Senator's whole speech, I object to the further reading, because he cannot make a speech by merely reading the letters of others. I move to dispense with the further reading.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator will pardon me again. I commenced my remarks and stated the case, and stated that I wished these two letters read as part of my speech; but if the Clerk will return them to me, as I have the floor I will read them myself.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will permit them to be read. I objected to the proceeding; but on the understanding that there would be no debate, and only the mere reading of the letters, I withdrew the objection. The Senator from Illinois was not in then.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not want to interfere with any arrangement that has been made in the Senate; I was not aware of any such arrangement; but I am sure the Senator from Indiana will see that this is a very bad practice.

The Secretary concluded the reading of the letters.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move that the resolution from the Committee on Printing, directing that the proceedings of this military commission be printed, be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we ought to see the document. The committee report in favor of printing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Iowa will be entertained, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIMES. If Senators want to know something about this, I will tell them. The Secretary of War, the President of the United States, or some military chief or authority here, appointed a military commission to go out into the western country and examine into the conduct of military officers. It was wholly an ex parte commission; they took nothing but hearsay testimony; and in that testimony a great many officers were implicated who never knew anything about their names having been connected with it, some of whom have fallen gallantly fighting for the country without knowing up to the hour of their death that their names had been at all connected with it. When it was known by some of the officers that their names had been thus implicated, they were permitted to take ex parte testimony to refute the charges, and among that number was a citizen of my own State, General Curtis. When the resolution was first introduced calling for the proceedings of the McDowell military commission, I moved to amend it so as to call for the testimony that had been furnished by any officer in rebuttal of the charges against him, but that testimony has not been sent in connection with the testimony against them. I move that the resolution to print these proceedings be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY KELLOGG.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 103, for the relief of Mary Kellogg, report favorably. This resolution was first referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. They were discharged, and it was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were discharged, and it was then referred to the Committee on Pensions. There is an item in it which is appropriate to each of these committees. This widow is the widow of a man who was hanged at Richmond by the rebels a short time since as a spy. This joint resolution proposes to pay her the amount due to her husband at the time of his death for services in the Army and in the Navy, and also to give her the pension appropriately belonging to her as his widow. I think under the circumstances it ought to be passed, and passed now. It is short, has been passed by the House of Representatives, has been before three committees of the Senate, and is therefore pretty well understood.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) for the relief of Mary Kellogg was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the name of Spencer Kellogg be entered upon the rolls of the Navy Department, with the rank of fourth master, to date from June 1, 1862; and that Mary Kellogg, his widow, be put upon the pension list with the pension incident to the rank of her husband. It also directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the accounts of Spencer Kellogg, as a first lieutenant of infantry, from September 14, 1861, to October 28, 1861, and his accounts as fourth master in the Navy from August 1, 1862, to September 25, 1863, the date of his execution at Richmond, Virginia, by the rebels; and to pay any money due him to his widow, Mary Kellogg.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADE. I renew my motion to take up House bill No. 244.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of May, information relative to Mexican affairs, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report that accompanying the message is a large mass of documents embracing correspondence and other papers relating to our affairs with Mexico, and the pending questions between Mexico and France; the collection is very voluminous. So far as the committee have been able to examine it, they feel unable to affirm that it is at this moment of sufficient importance to justify its publication. Under the circumstances, they have directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. There is in connection with this publication naturally a question of economy with regard to which the Committee on Foreign Relations felt that the Committee on Printing would be the best judge.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that reference will not be made. I believe the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper committee when it is desired to get rid of something that nobody else wants. How is the Committee on Printing to go through this mass of documents at this session? If the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] were on the committee I should at once assent to the reference.

Mr. HALE. I concur with the remarks made by the Senator from Rhode Island. I think this matter peculiarly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and if they have not been able to decide whether this correspondence ought to be printed, it is unfair to turn it over to the Committee on Printing. I ask for a division of the question. I have no objection to discharging the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I think the Committee on Printing should not be called on to decide a question which the committee to whom it appropriately belongs have not been able to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division of the question being called for, the first vote will be on discharging the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it proper to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CONNESS. I make that motion.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. I called out these documents.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WADE. I have no question in my own mind that these papers contain information as valuable and infinitely more so than two thirds of all those which we have printed at this session. I do not know but that there may be State secrets mixed up in these papers that some gentlemen feel tender-footed about; but they relate to great national affairs. I do not know how many of them are important; but that matters of importance are contained in them I have not the least doubt; and why they should be made a special exception to all that has been done in the way of printing, and why this particular spasm of economy in regard to that matter has come over this body just now, I cannot understand. I hope these papers will be printed; I hope the world will be allowed to know what there is in them. If there is anything contained in them which is worthy of investigation and which the people should know, the best way is to print them as we usually do. If I am mistaken about them, if they contain nothing valuable, it is worth while to print them to let the people understand that that is the fact. In either case, no satisfactory result will be arrived at in regard to these papers unless we resort to the ordinary course and order them to be printed. If you suppress them, you may give rise to a suspicion of something wrong when there is nothing wrong. If there is anything important in them, the people ought to know it. I hope they will be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I have but a word to say. I said that there was a question of economy in connection with the printing of this vast mass of papers. If printed, they will occupy at least two volumes as large as the report of the committee on the conduct of the war. The Committee on Foreign Relations have no connection with the Superintendent of Printing which would enable them to obtain estimates of the expense of such a publication. Those estimates are habitually obtained by our Committee on Printing. It was felt, therefore, that it belonged properly to that committee to consider whether, under the circumstances, it was expedient, after ascertaining what the expense would be, to authorize the publication.

Mr. WADE. Let me ask the Senator how much the expense would be.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know. I have not the honor of being upon the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of printing these papers. I think they ought to be printed. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that they are infinitely more valuable to the country and have more permanent importance than three fourths of all the matter that is ordered to be printed by the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. I hope these papers will not be printed for two reasons, either of which, it strikes me, would be ample. In the first place, if they are printed nobody will read them; and in the second place, if people do read them nobody will care anything about them. We have something else to think about at present than the consideration of any such questions as arise in this case.

Mr. CONNESS. Is not a motion to print the usual number in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The present motion before the Senate is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that question will be taken.

The motion to discharge was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, I move that the usual number of these papers be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what will be the probable expense of printing the usual number of this document.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is hardly possible for me to tell.

Mr. WADE. How much?

Mr. ANTHONY. I should think somewhere between six hundred and a thousand dollars.

Mr. WADE. I think the publication is worth that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to print the document must be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONNESS. Is that the case where the motion is to print the usual number only?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The motion will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

SENATORS FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to what I suppose to be a question of privilege, to ask the Senate to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that Messrs. Baxter and Fishback, whose credentials were referred to that committee, are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas. I will state to the Senate that the conclusion of the committee was unanimous; there was no disagreement in committee, and I do not suppose it will lead to discussion in the Senate. I think it due to the gentlemen who have presented themselves here that we should vote upon the question and settle it, and as there was no difference in the committee, I trust it will not lead to any extended remarks in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to take up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY RAILROAD TO EAST TENNESSEE.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to be allowed to make a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio to East Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will ask for the present consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot give way for that purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the letter of the Secretary of War addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, with the inclosed letter of General Halleck on the subject of that joint resolution, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 339) to repeal a joint resolution to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 340) to provide for the survey and sale of the mineral lands, and to extend the right of pre-emption thereto; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that this is a bill of great consequence to the State which I represent here and to the country generally, and my purpose in introducing it now is that it may be made the subject of public consideration.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of "Yosemite Valley" and of the land embracing the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove;" and

A bill (No. 226) to aid in the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives upon a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes;

A bill (No. 559) to quiet the titles to lands within the Rancho Laguna de Santos Calle, in the State of California; and

A bill (No. 561) to authorize the United States to acquire land in Wallabout bay, belonging to the city of Brooklyn, and to authorize the exchange of other lands therefor.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. L. D. M. SWEAT of Maine, and Mr. IGNATIUS DONNELLY of Minnesota, managers at the same on its part.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 25th instant, the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (H. R. No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865;

An act (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 247) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to build a military road to Lake Superior;

An act (H. R. No. 434) to authorize the bailiff of the orphans' court in the county of Washington and District of Columbia to serve processes issued by said court, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 453) to increase the pension of Isaac Allen;

An act (H. R. No. 545) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property destroyed in the military service of the United States;"

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) amendatory of an act to provide for the deficiency for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department or department of Missouri;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to amend the contract with John Ericsson for the construction of two impregnable floating batteries, the Dictator and the Puritan; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Major Morris S. Miller, of the quartermaster's department.

And on the 28th instant, the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (H. R. No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 512) to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves;

An act (H. R. No. 519) repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 537) to incorporate the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Washington;

An act (H. R. No. 551) to incorporate the Colored Catholic Benevolent Society;

An act (H. R. No. 554) to provide for the improvement of the grounds of the Government hospital for the insane by an exchange of lands;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) correcting a clerical error in the award of the emancipation commissioners;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) to declare the construction of a joint resolution for the relief of W. B. Matchett, approved June 20, 1864; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) to continue in force the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1860.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed, on the 27th instant, the following acts:

An act (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 187) to carry into effect a treaty between the United States and her Britannic Majesty for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies;

An act (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; and

An act (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill of the House (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route.

On motion by Mr. HARLAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. DOOLITTLE, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. NESMITH.

NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report at this time. ["No objection."] The select committee on naval supplies have instructed me to make a report, which I submit and move to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to print the report.

Mr. CONNESS. Just such a motion a little while ago the Chair decided should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of a committee can be printed for the use of the Senate without that reference.

Mr. CONNESS. Was not the report of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did not report a motion to print, but reported back certain papers from his committee; a motion to print them was made, and that motion went to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to accompany this report by a motion to print two thousand extra copies, which motion I suppose will go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will.

Mr. DOOLITTLE subsequently said: In my absence this morning I understand that the Senator from New Hampshire assumed to make a report as coming from the committee of investigation in regard to certain matters connected with the furnishing of naval supplies. When that Senator comes in I shall have something to say on that subject. I will only say now that by the understanding of the committee no report has yet been made; and I shall wait until the Senator comes in before I venture to allow myself to speak what I think in relation to what has occurred.

SENATORS FROM ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution taken up on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to postpone the consideration of the resolution until the first Monday of December next.

The question was put; and it was declared that the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I rose in time to ask for the yeas and nays on the postponement of the resolution and addressed the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will it not suit the Senator just as well to take the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution? I have no objection to the yeas and nays on the postponement if he desires them.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will state what my object is. I do not want to say anything or do anything to discourage the Union men of the State of Arkansas. They have a State government in motion; they have sent their Senators here, and I hope by the meeting of the next session of Congress they will be able to satisfy the Senate that their Senators are entitled to seats. I desire, therefore, to record my vote, if I am the only one, in favor of postponing the question until December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. NESMITH. I hope this resolution will be postponed. I am not prepared at present to vote either for the admission or the rejection of these claimants, for the reason that the matter has not been presented to the Senate and investigated here, and I have had no opportunity to read the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it is a subject of sufficient importance to be pretty thoroughly investigated. If it be deferred till December, no injury can arise from the postponement, and I would much prefer that course. I do not like to vote to receive or reject Senators until I have had an opportunity to investigate all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. HALE. If there is a single question that this Congress ought to settle before it adjourns it is this and questions cognate to it affecting the presidential election, for they are pregnant with great danger to the peace of the country. If Congress adjourns and goes home leaving them unsettled it will, I think, neglect its plainest duty. If the state of the poll at the coming presidential election should be such that the question who is to be President of the United States would depend upon the votes of States in the situation of Arkansas and Louisiana, if the votes of States thus situated should be such as to decide the result, do you believe, sir, does the Senate believe that in the present state of the country the party who would have elected their President but for the admission of those votes would submit to such a result? I believe that this question is pregnant with civil war, and that if such a state of things should occur we should be in very great danger of having another rebellion on our hands. We can settle it now without difficulty, without embarrassment; and I think we owe it to the country, we owe it to ourselves, that the simple question of what are States of the Union for the purposes of the next presidential election should be settled by law or joint resolution before we separate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. If there is any person in this body who feels a stronger anxiety and desire that the loyal men of these States who have been under the pressure of rebellion should be recognized and encouraged, fostered and protected, I should like to see that man; but, sir, we must not suffer our feelings to get the better of our judgment. We cannot disregard the fact which is admitted by the gentlemen asking seats on this floor, that the State of Arkansas is still in a condition of rebellion. We cannot disguise the fact that the President of the United States has, in pursuance of a law of Congress authorizing him so to do, published his proclamation declaring this State, among others, in a state of insurrection and rebellion. And while that statute and this proclamation exist, I myself, notwithstanding my anxiety and my desire, my most earnest wishes, cannot see my way clear in voting to admit these respectable gentlemen to seats upon this floor. That, and that alone, restrains my hand and controls my vote.

I think, sir, we need some authoritative act on the part of Congress or the President—I do not myself go so far as to say that it is necessary to have an act of Congress—declaring the condition of these States. I think the same power which binds can unloose, so to speak. I think that as we authorized the President by his proclamation to declare certain States under certain circumstances to be in rebellion, and to intermit or prohibit intercourse and trade with those States, when such a state of facts shall exist under the progress of our arms as to authorize the President of the United States or the Congress (as may be determined) in declaring that the rebellion has been put down, and when the loyal people in those districts or States, they being in my opinion still in the Union, have organized a new constitution, or organized themselves under a constitution having a republican form of Government secured by it, then, and then for the first time, can we as a Senate under the law admit to seats on this floor persons appointed or elected as Senators from those States.

I do not mean to take up time, but, with my feeling strongly biasing me, I am yet restrained by my consciousness of what the law is to vote for the resolution as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think we ought to decide it now. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that it is one of the most important and engrossing subjects that can occupy the attention of this body, and calls for our action now over and above anything else, save the stern, severe duty of passing bills to appropriate money and raise men for carrying on the war.

Mr. NESMITH. As I said before, I am not prepared to vote on this question. I do not know that I shall vote for the admission of the gentlemen claiming seats from Arkansas under any circumstances. For the admission of one of them I certainly would not vote if the statement which has been made here be corroborated in relation to his vote for secession. I have never believed in the legality of secession; I have never been disposed or inclined to recognize it in any way; I have never believed and I do not believe to-day that the State of Arkansas or any other State of this Union has gone out of the Union. I have never recognized the doctrine that a convention of disorganizers and rebels could legitimately assemble within the boundaries of any State or abolish the Constitution either of the State or of the United States. I believe that the State of Arkansas is to-day as much a State of this Union as the State of New York, and there is no power, in my opinion, that can place her beyond the pale of the Union. If I am correct in that doctrine (and I do not think it can be controverted) as to the illegality of a State going out of the Union, if the State is in the Union she certainly has a right under the Constitution to representation in Congress, and whenever that representation presents itself here under the forms prescribed by the Constitution of the United States it should be admitted if there is no objection to the men; and when I say objection to the men, I mean they must be men who have not committed acts which would preclude them from taking the oath necessary to be taken in order to entitle them to seats on this floor. I intend to vote for the admission of Senators under every circumstance when they come here as authorized by the Constitution. What may be embodied in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in this case I do not know. I certainly should have very great respect for anything emanating from that committee, but I have not had time to read it, and I merely present this as my own view of the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair must announce the fact that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This being a question of privilege, in reference to the seat of members on the floor, I suppose must be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question relating to the constitution of the body is a question of privilege, and, unless the Senate otherwise order, the discussion will proceed on this question. It was, however, the duty of the Chair under the rule to state the fact that the hour had arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall detain the Senate but a single moment, and I would not that long but for some remarks which fell from the Senator from Oregon. The Committee on the Judiciary were aware of this controverted question as to whether Arkansas was a State in the Union or out of the Union, and as to what would be necessary to put a State in the Union if it were out, and they have avoided the expression of any opinion on such points. The committee have confined themselves entirely to the question referred to them, the credentials of the gentlemen claiming seats from the State of Arkansas, and the question discussed by the committee was simply this, whether they were elected by the Legislature of Arkansas; and the committee state that from the facts before them they are not satisfied that the body which returned these gentlemen here is in a legal sense, in the constitutional sense, the Legislature of Arkansas which would have authority to elect Senators. The report was laid on the tables of Senators yesterday, and I am sorry the Senator from Oregon has not looked it over. Although there was some difference as to whether a law was necessary in the first instance before a Legislature could be organized that could elect Senators, the committee forbore to express any opinion upon that; but whether a law is necessary in the first instance, the joint action of Congress, to organize a Legislature which would be authorized to elect Senators, or whether it is not, the body sending these gentlemen here, the committee were of opinion, was not such a Legislature as was authorized to elect Senators to the Senate of the United States, because the committee from the facts before them did not believe that the body of men who assumed to elect these gentlemen was a body of men selected by the loyal inhabitants of Arkansas entirely unrestrained by military authority; and we were of opinion that until a state of things existed in Arkansas so that the loyal inhabitants could have an opportunity freely to express their opinions in the selection of a legislative body no legislative body could convene having authority to elect Senators. However anxious we all were to encourage the loyal sentiment of Arkansas, yet knowing the fact that part of that State is in the possession of hostile armies, that those armies exercise supreme authority over a considerable portion of the State at this time, a large portion of the State being in the possession of the enemy, the President's proclamation declaring the inhabitants of the State to be in a state of insurrection being unrecalled, we were of opinion that the body which assembled there and the government which had been set up by it was not that republican form of government which the Constitution requires the United States to guaranty to each State in the Union; that to be a republican form of government such as the Constitution contemplates, it must be a civil government paramount and not subordinate to military authority.

These were the considerations in a general view that occurred to the committee as conclusive upon the right of these gentlemen to seats. I forbear to go into a general discussion of the question. I was in hopes we could have a vote without discussion, because we have sought to avoid in the report the controverted point to which the Senator from Oregon has alluded, whether Arkansas be a State in the Union or a State not in the Union.

Mr. NESMITH. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that I merely suggested that point as a reason why action should be deferred until the next session. I stated that I was not prepared to vote for or against the admission of these gentlemen at present. I did not raise it with a view of provoking any discussion whatever.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only wish to say that it would matter not whether Arkansas were in the Union or out of the Union; if in either event she has not such a body of men as a Legislature as would be entitled to elect Senators, the persons sent here could not be admitted. That is the general ground on which we have acted.

Mr. WADE. If it is in order, I move to postpone this and all prior questions, and take up House bill No. 244. The House of Representatives at an early period in the session with great deliberation and labor had this whole subject under consideration, and undertook to provide in this bill for just such cases as this as they shall arise. The bill of the House is pending before us now on this very subject, covering the whole ground, and it seems to me better that we should take that up first, which will set a rule by which all these questions may be finally decided, instead of taking up each case and arguing the whole question on each case as it shall arise. It would be doing the House of Representatives great injustice for us not to consider this bill at this session of Congress. It was reported by a very able committee of that House, who deliberated long upon this subject. That bill has been referred to a committee of this body who have had it long under consideration, and I have been seeking an opportunity for many days when more pressing questions should not be pending to bring it up and if possible settle it here, not only for this case but for all other cases that may arise of a like character. I hope the Senate will conclude with me that it is better that we should postpone this question for the present and take up the bill which covers the whole ground, and if we should agree with the House of Representatives it will form a rule deciding not only this question but all others of a like character.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was precisely because of the view taken by the Senator from Ohio that I desired to get action upon the right of these gentlemen to seats. The Senator from Ohio has charge of a very important bill, as he says, involving the question of the reconstruction of the States. That is a question which will give rise doubtless to great debate; a very important question, one which Congress ought to settle. Admit all this; the gentlemen claiming seats from Arkansas have a right to have the question decided. It is the duty of the Senate to decide it. It is a question of high privilege. The Senator's bill may pass or may not pass; but whether it passes or not, this case will have to be decided. This case is not dependent upon that bill. If the Senate and House of Representatives should come to the conclusion that the State of Arkansas was in the Union, and had a perfect right by its Legislature to elect Senators, still, in the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary, the body which elected these men was not such a Legislature as could elect; and your bill does not settle that. We have avoided these controverted questions; and I think if the Senator from Ohio will let his bill lie we may be able to get a vote on this case. I did not suppose there would be any discussion on it, and I am not aware now that there will be.

Besides, this question does not interfere with his bill. It is a very appropriate forerunner to the bill, it seems to me. Let us get a vote on this question, and then take up his bill and decide that. It is enough for us to decide on these credentials if the Senate is prepared to act upon them that the gentlemen claiming to be Senators are or are not entitled to seats here. The committee tried to place it on such grounds as would not provoke discussion in the Senate on controverted points, and I think we have done so; and I trust the Senator from Ohio will let us take a vote on the resolution.

Mr. WADE. If I did not think, if indeed I did not know, that the question raised by the Judiciary Committee in regard to the admission of the gentlemen claiming to be Senators from Arkansas involved all the points contained in this bill and would call them all out in argument before the Senate, I should be very willing to let the resolution be first acted upon; but I have not the least idea that the question of their admission here will be settled without as thorough an investigation of all the points involved in the passage of this bill as there would be if we considered the bill itself. I think the only result of taking up the resolution first will be that we shall be detained here to hear all the arguments on each subject. Every one of them is involved in each case and properly within the range of legitimate and fair debate. The question, what is the character of a seceded State, what is its relation to the Federal Government now, does it exist as a State or is it annihilated by the rebellion? these are questions that I can already see will be agitated in the debate as to the admission of these Senators. The question involves every point that is involved in the bill. It is to save time that I have made the motion to lay aside the resolution and take up the bill which I believe will settle the whole controversy; it is because I wish to escape as much debate as possible. I leave the matter for the decision of the Senate. I cannot withdraw my motion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the motion of the Senator from Ohio will prevail. I am as anxious as any Senator to settle this whole question, but the passage of the resolution proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary does not settle anything. I am one of those who believe that the State government belongs to the loyal people of a State without reference to their number. The loyal people of Arkansas have elected a Legislature and that Legislature has sent Senators here. There was no doubt in the hearts of those men that these Senators would be received, and they had reason to believe that they would be received. Here is a law of the Congress of the United States, admitting the State of Arkansas and agreeing that she should have two Senators upon this floor, standing on the statute-book unrepealed. In that condition of affairs, the Committee on the Judiciary comes forward with a resolution that the State of Arkansas is not entitled to two Senators without repealing the law giving her two Senators. It settles nothing.

It is enough that we are fighting with people for seceding, without fighting with them for trying to get back into the Union. I want to extend to them the helping hand, believing, as I do, that the only way the loyal people of any of the seceded States can successfully fight secession is by organized State governments. Here is a State government that has been recognized by the executive department of this Government, and although I have not determined for myself whether to vote for the admission of these two gentlemen or not, I am exceedingly desirous that the question shall not be settled at this session against the loyal people of Arkansas.

Let us pass the bill proposed by the House of Representatives, and which the Senator from Ohio has moved to take up. That will advertise the loyal people as to what course they are to pursue, but let us not dampen their ardor or discourage them by a refusal to admit their two Senators regularly elected. If it be true that the government of a State belongs to the loyal people of that State, here is a legitimate election, with credentials regular, in the usual form, with the law upon the statute-book giving the people of Arkansas two Senators unrepealed, and I believe the Judiciary Committee do not suggest a repeal of that law. It will not do, in my opinion, as a politician, to say to the people of this country by a solemn vote that the State governments of the seceded States do not belong to the loyal people of those States without reference to their numbers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator, I presume, is aware that the committee say no such thing.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There is no other reason, in my opinion, for the Judiciary Committee deciding that these Senators are not legally elected. The reason of the decision is that the traitors in arms did not join in the election of members of the Legislature.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not a word of it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Those members were regularly elected by the loyal people of the State, all of them joining in the election.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator cannot have read a part of the report. Let me read this portion of the report to him:

"The number of persons in Arkansas who voted for President in 1860 was fifty-four thousand and fifty-three, less than one fourth of whom, as appears from the statement of the claimants, took part in the reorganization of the State government. This, however, would not be fatal to the reorganization if all who were loyal to the Union had an opportunity to participate, and the State was free from military control."

Now, does the Senator pretend that the Committee on the Judiciary said that traitors must have an opportunity to vote? We say expressly it is not fatal to the reorganization of the State government that a majority did not vote, or that less than one fourth only voted, if all the loyal people had an opportunity to vote free from military control.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The loyal people who were in the State of Arkansas at the time had the opportunity to vote and did vote. Does the Senator from Illinois mean to say that it was indispensable for a legal organization that loyal men of the State of Arkansas who were outside of the State should have participated? We do not know that they will ever return. We do know that the loyal people who were within the borders of the State of Arkansas had the opportunity to participate and did participate. And I say here it will not do to declare that the loyal people of one of the seceded States, without reference to numbers, have not the right to take upon themselves the State government that has been suspended by the rebellion. There is but one voice among the loyal men of this country on that question, and that is, that any number, however few, of the loyal men of a State, have a right to take upon themselves the burdens and receive the benefits of the suspended State government. These loyal people have done so at the earliest possible moment; they have assumed the duties and responsibilities of a State government, they have elected their Senators under a law upon your statute-book, and sent them here with regular credentials. I hope the resolution of the Senator from Illinois will be superseded by the bill of the Senator from Ohio, and I say to the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from New Jersey that the way to settle this great question is not in parts but as a whole. Let us grapple with the whole question, take up the bill passed by the other House and pass it here, and not wound the loyal hearts of the gallant men of Arkansas by rejecting and spurning from our doors their legally elected Senators.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the motion of the Senator from Ohio will not prevail. No more important question can be presented to the consideration of the Senate than is presented by the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. Entertaining the views I do, I want to see it settled now. I hold, with the great mass of the Democratic party to which I belong, that Arkansas is a State in this Union; that South Carolina is a State in this Union; that their ordinances of secession are void, not only voidable but absolutely void. Every one of those States which has assumed to secede, is de jure a State of this Union, although de facto they may be out of the Union; and, sir, in the course of a few brief months a party I hope will be installed in power which will recognize the correctness of this principle and will apply themselves to the greatest task ever committed to mortal man, the reconciling of these differences and bringing back into willing obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the land the States which have assumed to go out of the Union.

While I hold to this principle, and while the party to which I belong holds to it, and while every honest effort they can make will be made for the accomplishment of the objects I have indicated, we do not hold to the doctrine that any State can be represented in this body except by the free, unbiased choice of its people. These gentlemen present themselves as Senators, not under the constitution or laws of the State of Arkansas as that State existed before it assumed to discontinue its relations to the Federal Government, but they appear here as the representatives of a new-made State, new-made not by the voice of the people of Arkansas, but new-made by the voice of the man who sits enthroned at the other end of the avenue; a State made by proclamation!

Sir, what is the attitude in which these gentlemen present themselves to the Senate of the United States for admission into this body? Do they come pretending that by the voice of the people of Arkansas they are sent here? Do they come pretending that according to the constitution and laws of the State of Arkansas, when it assumed to cease its connection with the Federal Union, they are here? No, sir; but they come, agencies of a presidential proclamation, asking for admission here.

No more important question can be presented to the American Senate or to the American people than this: is it within the power of a Federal Executive to make or unmake a State? More important consequences depend on the proper solution of the question than gentlemen apprehend. If it be true that according to the theory of our Government a President can make a State or reduce a State into a territorial dependency, then, sir, have we misread the teachings of the fathers; then have the illustrations of our system of Government proved false; then, indeed, shall we be reduced not to the condition of a Federal Union, but of an absolute, central, consolidated Government. I wish the Senate of the United States to determine this question now and immediately, and not take up the bill reported by the honorable Senator from Ohio, because it is utterly impossible to get through with the discussion of that bill at least during the present week. The questions which it raised are so momentous in their consequences that it is impossible for the friends of the Federal Union to sit here quietly and allow it to be passed without discussion.

Sir, when peace, heavenly peace, shall return—for peace descends from heaven; war springs from hell—when the days of peace shall return, what is the attitude that the present Executive of the United States will find himself in? Suppose that this bogus government in the State of Arkansas be recognized; suppose that the President of the United States attempts by the military arm to cause the behests of such a government to be executed, what is the position in which he places himself? When peace returns and law prevails and the courts of justice are open, he is liable to trial for treason for levying war against the United States of America, and because Arkansas is a constituent member of that Government, liable to an indictment for treason in making war upon a sovereign State of this Union by attempting the establishment of a government unknown to the constitution of that State and unrecognized by the Constitution of the United States.

I protest, therefore, in the face of the American people against a policy destructive not only of our State but of our Federal system. When you get possession of the State of Arkansas, if you ever shall, it will be time enough then to recognize their representatives in this body. While that State, through all the forms of legislation known to a State, discards your authority, although you and I know that by so discarding it they violate their duty to the Federal Government, admit no representative into this Chamber or into the House of Representatives coming from them; but when like erring members of the Federal system, by the voluntary action of their people they come and recognize your authority, recognize the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and Federal laws, admit them into participation in your councils; but until they do so recognize your authority, admit them not here to participate in your debates or in your counsels.

Sir, Arkansas rightfully, constitutionally, legally, by all the honorable ties that can bind a State to this Union, is in the Union, and no ordinance of secession on their part and no action of the Federal Congress can give validity to any assumption on their part that they are not members of this Union, and by no vote of mine will I ever recognize the right of a State to secede; but I will say this: the flag of my country has a right to wave over every foot of our territory, and you have got no right to discard that relation of the State to the Federal Government; you have no right to treat them as out of the Union as you will do if you admit these Senators from that State. You have got no right constitutionally to recognize the validity of a presidential proclamation which substantially treats them as out of the Union, and undertakes to readmit them as States. I know there is a provision of the Federal Constitution that new States may be admitted into this Union. What does it mean? New States may be admitted out of territory that was not originally a State; but how do you reduce an original State into a territorial dependency, a territorial condition? No such provision exists, and I charge upon the majority of this body, if they do admit these men, that they recognize the doctrine of secession, they proclaim by their votes that it is in the power of a State of this Union to dissolve its connection with our Federal system; and they go further, they assert the power of making a new State out of an existing State, and to make it by a presidential proclamation. I protest against such a doctrine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair

will take occasion to remark that the motion before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of House bill No. 244; and a motion in regard to the order of business does not open the merits of either question for consideration. The remarks of Senators should be confined to reasons stated as briefly as may be, according to the rule previously laid down by the Chair, for proceeding with the one or the other, not discussing the merits of either question.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion and let us get a vote on the resolution before the Senate. It has been discussed to the end; there can be no question as to the manner in which the Senate will decide it, and I hope we shall have a vote this morning on it.

Mr. WADE. If I had any indication that the question of the admission of these Senators would not be further debated, I would withdraw my motion. I do not believe it.

Mr. TRUMBULL, and others. Try it.

Mr. WADE. Very well, I withdraw my motion; but if debate arises I will renew it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the motion of the Senator from Ohio to be withdrawn?

Mr. WADE. No; I stand by it. I think on reflection I had better insist on my motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, by the Constitution the Senate is made the sole and exclusive judge of the election, returns, and qualification of its members. An application is made in regular form, in the usual manner, on behalf of two gentlemen from the State of Arkansas, who claim that they have been duly chosen members of this body by a competent Legislature of that State. This subject was debated in the Senate upon both sides with much of earnestness and at length. It was then referred to the law committee of this body, has been considered by it, and reported upon at length; and by that report it is shown that this case can be rightfully determined without going into the general question of the status of the seceded States with reference to the Union.

Now, sir, at this stage of the proceeding, when a judicial question over which we have constitutional jurisdiction, and over which we alone have jurisdiction, is made up, when the discussion has taken place, when a committee has considered it and reported upon it, and when every public interest and every consideration of private right involved demand its discussion, what is proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE?] That we should abdicate this judicial function committed to us by the Constitution, and in connection with the House of Representatives enter upon our legislative functions, upon the discussion of a general measure involving not the decision of this case at all, involving no determination of any point connected with this inquiry, but launching us abroad upon the general ocean or upon the wide public field of debate in which political considerations and considerations of expediency are mainly involved, instead of those which legitimately pertain to this question.

Sir, we are sitting, so far as the present point is involved, in a judicial character, and we are to decide this case, not upon considerations of expediency or of policy, but upon the principles of justice and of legal right as applied to these claimants. The bill which it is proposed to substitute for this measure is prospective. It relates to the future. If it establish anything it will establish a law, a rule for our future conduct. It will have no application to the question of the rightfulness of a past act as to the regularity or lawfulness of the proceeding in the State of Arkansas by which these gentlemen were chosen. That is a question upon which the legislative department cannot pass by bill or by joint resolution. It pertains to the judicial function of this body with reference to its members and of the House of Representatives in a similar capacity with reference to application for seats in that body. I say, therefore, sir, that as I view this subject it is our appropriate business, nay, it is our duty, a duty charged upon us by the Constitution, to proceed to determine this case now as all the preliminary steps necessary to its decision have been taken.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] proposes to postpone this subject until the month of December next. I shall proceed, in addition to what I have already said, to state two considerations which stand opposed to that motion. In the first place, I presume the only practical result, so far as these claimants are concerned, would be that the Treasury of the United States would be obliged to make compensation to them for a year. If we keep them dancing attendance upon us, waiting our sovereign pleasure in regard to their cases, we cannot afterwards very well resist an appeal to compensate them for the time expended and expenses incurred by them; and I suppose that is really the only point involved in the motion to postpone. That motion raises the question whether we shall charge these gentlemen on the Treasury of the United States for this additional period, or by determining their case now conclude that interesting point.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I beg to interrupt the Senator from Pennsylvania. The idea of remunerating these gentlemen for the time between now and December never entered my mind, and I presume has not been entertained by them.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I spoke not of motives; I spoke of results; and the result which I have indicated will probably be the only effect of the motion of the Senator from Kansas, to keep this question of membership open until December next. It will then be decided precisely as we shall decide it now if we proceed to its decision.

But, sir, there is a general consideration which stands opposed to this dilatory motion, and opposed also to the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio; in short, which stands opposed to all motions and to any action of the Senate by which the immediate decision of this important question will be avoided. Sir, do you desire to interject into the debates of this year throughout the United States another and a most dangerous element? Do you desire to fix public attention and to arouse public passion by an issue of the description which will be presented by the proposition now before the Senate? Does it comport with the public interest that you should send that issue down to the people to agitate and to disturb them when they are engrossed with other questions legitimate and proper for their decision, and when this is really your business and your question upon which the Constitution commits power exclusively to you, and which it demands that you should decide? It seems to me that this consideration controls the case, and should rule the action which is taken upon it by the Senate.

We know, sir, that this is a most dangerous question in certain possible aspects of the future. I hope, for one, that the Senate by proceeding to decide it now will relieve the debates of the present year from this question. There is no difficulty in deciding it now. I do not doubt what the Senate will do if they proceed to its decision at this time. But leave it open, allow the passions of the country to take hold of it, and allow the party interests of the country to become connected with its decision at some future time, and no man can foresee the consequences, no man is entitled to pronounce with certainty and assurance of mind that a contested presidential election will not be the source of civil war and convulsion in this country, as it has been in every other republic which has been established in the New World. I have been in the South American republics; I have contemplated their career; and of all the questions which can divide a population in a republic, which can lay the foundation of civil war and convulsion and debauch the whole political society permanently, a disputed presidential election is chief and foremost. Sir, the slightest possibility of such a condition of things in this country should cause Senators to decide at the earliest moment the question out of which such difficulties may arise, to decline any permission to any party or interest to raise such an issue before this people.

Mr. WADE. From the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I am a little at a loss to know whether he is in favor of taking up my measure or the other. He says these questions are exceedingly dangerous, some of them. Now, sir, what is the question? Here is a bill that has been pending longer than almost any bill before the body. It was passed very early in the House of Representatives; it has been a long time before us here. The other question has been a long time pending before us as to the admission of Senators from Arkansas, and it has lain very quiet; there has been no attempt to press that subject until I came in this morning to get up this bill. Having in my charge a bill that is admitted to be one of the most important that has been before Congress during this whole session, if I lay still and permitted everything else to be done and did not call it up it seemed to me I should be derelict in my duty and unfaithful to the trust that the Senate had reposed in me. I delayed it as long as I felt that I could do so consistently with my duty. I delayed it while all your tax bills, while all your revenue bills, while all your appropriation bills were pending, while all your war measures were undisposed of; but when they are all through, when nothing more remains to be done on those pressing measures, I deem it my duty to bring forward this great measure of the session. I gave notice more than a week ago that on the first occasion that I could get the floor I should earnestly press this question on the consideration of the Senate, and the first opportunity that I thought I had I embraced; and then what is the result? The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] rises to antagonize this measure with mine at once. He had not shown any very great impatience to get it up until I made my motion. Why attempt now to embarrass the great measure of the session with this question of the admission of these members? I admit it is important to act on such a question; it is a privileged question, I believe, that may be taken up over anything else, but I do not understand why Senators who have lain so quiet up to this time should be so impatient the moment I rise to get up my measure.

I would not feel very anxious upon this question if I did not hear it all around me stated that we were about to adjourn. I think we ought not to adjourn as long as there is any important question that can arise before us. I do not know that it is the intention of the Senate to adjourn soon; but I hear it from all quarters that at all events we must adjourn this week. If so, whoever is charged with an important measure would not be justified if he did not endeavor to bring it to the notice of Congress at once. I hope we shall not adjourn leaving one single important measure behind. If we do so we cannot justify ourselves before the American people. In a time like this, when the nation is struggling with its fate, to manifest a childish impatience to withdraw from the councils of the nation is unworthy of an American Senator. I do not know that any member harbors any such intention; but I am alarmed by hearing it, side-bar, everywhere that we are just going to adjourn. I do not believe it. I do not believe there is a member of this body who has not a better opinion of the duty he owes to the nation in times like this than to meditate adjourning and leaving before we are through with everything that anybody can say is important. If I had an assurance that we should have patience to do up all our business before we leave you would not find me rising in my seat to antagonize this with anybody's measure. I would not care a straw then which of these questions you took first. If the Senator from Illinois is impatient to have this question of his tried, he may test it; I am sure it is an important question whether Senators shall have a seat on this floor or not, and one too that ought to be decided, and promptly decided. But when I see that the question arises in such a form that the debate upon it will involve all the points necessarily involved in the passage of the bill that will make a general principle for all like cases, it does occur to me that it is better to take up the bill and settle the general principle before we take up the particular questions that will involve just as much controversy. I know the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks otherwise. He says they are entirely distinct from each other. The peculiar questions are separate, but the principles involved are about the same.

I know that the passage of this bill does not affect the right of these gentlemen to seats here; but it establishes the principle that will be drawn into the argument all over the Senate. My friends around me believe that the question of the admission of these members can be taken without any further debate. I do not believe it. I believe that every principle involved in the passage of this bill will be argued in the Senate and debated by every gentleman who sees fit to debate it, during the pendency of the resolution of the Senator from Illinois.

I have no doubt that the Senate will stay here and determine all these questions, because I will not believe that there is a Senator in this body who would turn his back upon the great councils of the nation under circumstances like these, while anybody was urging a question upon its consideration that he believed important. When I say this, I admit that no Senator is more anxious to get out of the city and go home than I am myself, but I would as soon desert the camp of the soldier and run away; and I should feel myself now infinitely more disgraced by leaving the councils of the nation before everything was done than I would were I a soldier in the Army deserting my colors and running home. The world may not consider it so, but one would be as eminently disgraceful as the other. Let us take these questions up, then, and settle them all. I do not understand that the gentlemen from Arkansas who are here, or who have been here, are pressing their case on the consideration of the Senate. I do not know but that they are. If they are it would have the effect upon my mind of inducing me to yield to their case, to permit it to be decided; but I do not understand that they are here urging immediate decision. Therefore I must stand by my own motion. I have given fair notice of it. I intended to make it this morning; it was very well understood that when reports were over the bill would be taken up. I believe everybody on this side had reason to suppose so, and yet it was antagonized immediately by this other question which had not been stated before.

I will make no further remarks; I hope the vote will be taken. I do not think there is any very special reason why I should be superseded in the attempt to get up the reconstruction bill now; but if the Senate think there is, let them go on with the other question. I prefer that the question I have made should be settled by the Senate, because I do not believe I can justify myself to my constituents, or to the House of Representatives who have sent this bill here for our action, if I consent to further delay, unless the Senate so direct, and I shall stand by their verdict. If they say this other question is the most important and must be settled, so be it, but let them decide it.

Mr. HOWE. I rose some time ago to say to the Senator from Ohio that my own judgment is that the question arising on the report of the Judiciary Committee had better be first decided. The view that I take of these questions I apprehend is peculiar to myself; but it is such a view that while I have no reason to doubt but that I shall support the bill moved by the Senator from Ohio, the action of Congress on that question would not affect my judgment, if I understand the character of that bill aright, upon the question presented on the report of the Judiciary Committee, and I think the Senate will concede that if the gentlemen who are presented here as the representatives of Arkansas really have a right to seats here, that right ought to be declared and they put in possession of it before we act upon the measure moved by the Senator from Ohio. If they have an interest to be affected by the action of the Congress of the United States upon any question whatever, they have an interest in being represented on that question. There is probably no one measure that they would feel so anxious to be represented upon and to be heard upon as the very measure moved by the Senator from Ohio.

For these reasons I think we had better pass upon their right first. That right is an existing thing, if there be any such right; it is to be determined upon the law as it is to-day, and not upon the law as we make it after to-day. The Senate can see that whatever might be the fate of that bill it would not affect the right of these candidates. In addition to this, I might say that it is understood to be a question of privilege itself, having the right of precedence by the law of the Senate. It is so ruled.

Mr. WADE. I have moved to postpone it, and that is in order.

Mr. HOWE. I do not undertake to declare the law, but for myself I understand the law to be so declared that it is a question of privilege, and therefore in acting upon it first we simply act in the order of business that the law has fixed.

Mr. WADE. If that be so, my motion is not in order.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that a motion to postpone even a question of privilege cannot be entertained.

Mr. WADE. Let the question be taken as to which we shall take up.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In answer to a suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] I desire to state that I differ from him entirely as to the decision of this question being the same at the next session as it will be if the vote is taken now. If by the help of God we are able to clear Arkansas of rebels by the next session, there will not then be half a dozen Senators who will not be willing to admit these men. The only difficulty now in their admission is the fact that a portion of the State of Arkansas is in possession of the rebels.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator answer me a question? Are these Senators pressing for a decision of their case? Are they anxious for its immediate decision?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On the contrary they are desirous as their people are to have the question postponed until the next session of Congress. I remember that my seat was contested, and we permitted it to go over to the next session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am astonished at the statement made by the Senator from Kansas. It is a very strange proceeding for gentlemen to present themselves with credentials and ask for seats when they do not wish seats at all and desire the question to be postponed for six months. I understood distinctly that they did desire to have their case decided. It is a very strange proceeding for persons to claim seats in this body and then desire not to have them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let me correct myself. They believe as I do that a decision against them would be discouraging to their people. That is what I meant to say, that it would be a stroke at the Union organization in the State of Arkansas.

In answer to another suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, I will say that the people of this country have already decided this question, and I so stated when I was up. The people have no sympathy with the opinion that these States are not in the Union. They recognize them as in the Union, and they recognize the loyal people, however few they may be, as having the right to reorganize or revive their State governments. I hope the Senator from Illinois understands these two applicants. They hope that a decision may not be made against them, for the reason that it will discourage their people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was very forcibly struck by the remarks made this morning upon this question by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I think it is very important that this question should be settled one way or the other before we adjourn, and the sooner we settle it the better. I am myself of the opinion, and have been from the beginning, that the question of reconstruction as it is called, the question of what is and what is not a State entitled to be represented here, should properly be settled by Congress, and cannot be settled by any other power than Congress in any possible way. I am of the opinion which is expressed, I believe, in the report, though my attention has not been specifically directed to it, that so far as the power to be represented here is concerned, a State which has been proclaimed in insurrection, which has been in the power of the enemy, and which has deliberately, so far as we may judge from its action in a certain way, pretended to join another confederacy, is not entitled to be represented here until she returns to her allegiance. It is not enough that a small portion or even a considerable portion of that people sustained by our military authority in the State declare themselves to be a State. We must first declare it by the admission of Senators or the admission of Representatives, and we ought to put an end at once to all these questions which have been raised with reference to the coming presidential election, because I think, as was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, that very serious consequences may follow if we leave them undetermined.

With regard to the bill which my honorable friend from Ohio proposes to take up, I have always been of opinion that before we attempt the business of reconstruction we should have something to reconstruct, something in our power; at any rate, it will not be too late to act upon that subject when we can make our action efficient. I do not wish now, however, to express any opinion whatever upon the details of the bill, or on the bill itself, because I have not studied it with sufficient care to form an opinion upon which I could rely. The other question, however, I deem of very great importance, and I think we, as a body, ought to settle it at once; and the wishes of the gentlemen who claim seats, if they have any wishes, are not to be consulted, or even the wishes of our friends there, in view of the very great importance of the question itself and the serious consequences that might possibly follow if we left anything with regard to it undetermined.

I did not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making an argument, but simply to state my views in accordance with those which have been expressed by others, and I hope the resolution of the committee will be acted upon so that we may settle the question.

Mr. SUMNER. In my opinion each of these questions is of great importance. Each ought to be settled by the Senate before we part. I am reluctant to give a precedence to one over the other; but, from the nature of the case, we must give a precedence to one over the other in order that business may be transacted. Now, by what rule shall that precedence be determined? The Senator from Illinois obtained the floor and moved to proceed to the consideration of the resolution of his committee with regard to the Arkansas Senators. That motion was agreed to. That resolution was the question before the Senate. Then it was that my friend from Ohio moved to postpone the resolution of the Senator from Illinois in order to proceed to the consideration of the measure which he has in charge. I am free to say that if the Senator from Ohio had been in the place of the Senator from Illinois, and had obtained the floor so as to make the motion to proceed with the consideration of his measure, I should have sustained that motion; but as the case is just reversed, as the floor was given to the Senator from Illinois, I shall deem it my duty to sustain his proposition. I do not think it right that two propositions which are of great importance, even if they are not of equal importance, should be antagonized with each other. I think, therefore, the business of the Senate and the harmony of our proceedings will be best consulted by going on with the question which was first moved.

Mr. WADE. The Senator from Massachusetts perhaps did not attend to this question when it was first started. Very early this morning I moved to take up this bill. The President decided that reports of committees must come in first. I had the floor, and I supposed according to custom I should be awarded it when reports were over. The Senator from Illinois understood that I was to have the floor, and I believe everybody here understood that I was to have this bill taken up this morning as early as possible. But before the reports were through, the Senator from Illinois rose to a question of privilege and moved to take up this resolution, and of course I could not get in the bill. As the resolution had lain quiet so long I did not see why it should be antagonized with the measure that I had in charge. I thought that as it had waited for months it might wait another day just as well, and I did not suppose that I should discharge my duty to this body if I did not insist upon taking up the bill; and yet I am told by the Senator from Massachusetts that I antagonized this measure with the other. The fact is right the other way.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the record settle it.

Mr. WADE. I do not care about the record; I am never great on technicalities. I thought my measure might as well go on; and besides, if the adjournment is to take place immediately, I intend to stand by this measure. I want my motion decided by the Senate and I shall be satisfied.

Mr. COWAN. I suppose every member feels it his duty at the close of the session to make a speech on every possible occasion when there is a chance to say a word; and it is impelled by that desire to do my duty that I rise to say that I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts in preferring that the resolution of the Judiciary Committee should be acted upon immediately, believing in the maxim prior est in tempore potior est in jure. I am ready to vote upon that resolution; and I am ready to vote upon it without any regard whatever to the fate of the bill which the Senator from Ohio has in charge, and I cannot conceive for my own part the most remote connection between the two. I think it is due to ourselves that we should determine the question arising on the report of the Judiciary Committee, and determine it immediately one way or the other. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Ohio will not succeed in his motion to displace it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Hurlan, Lane of Kansas, Sherman, and Wade—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I made a motion to postpone the resolution until December next; but this vote settles that question; and I desire, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion being withdrawn, the question is on the passage of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE. I trust the Senate will indulge me for a few minutes while I state, or try to state, the reasons which will compel me to vote, I presume by myself, against the resolution reported by this committee. I suppose from what I know of the opinion of the Senate that, with the exception of my vote, this resolution will receive the unanimous support of the Senate. I understand it is reported here as the unanimous opinion of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, a body combining, as we all know, a vast amount of learning and general ability; a body which I very well understand came to the consideration of this question with minds as unprejudiced and with as fixed a resolution to come to a correct conclusion as ever a body of men did take up a question; and therefore it cannot but be that I should have a great deal of hesitation in dissenting from the conclusion at which they have arrived. And yet, Mr. President, I beg leave to say, with the utmost respect, with the utmost deference to the character of that committee, and to the character of the body in which I stand, which I suppose to be unanimously against me, that there is not a single faculty and there is scarcely a single fiber in me that does not dissent from the doctrines stated in this report. I never can state to the Senate by any possibility the emphasis with which I believe this resolution is wrong.

The other day, when the question of referring these credentials to this committee was before the Senate, I read that clause of the Constitution which tells us what composes the Senate of the United States, and I read that act of Congress which admitted the State of Arkansas as one of the States of the Union. I reminded the Senate then that neither that Constitution nor that act of Congress had been repealed. The fact is so today. They have not been repealed; and therefore I cannot help but believe that if we exclude from their seats these gentlemen who are sent here from Arkansas we do nullify by the authority of the Senate alone and abrogate a statute of the United States and an essential clause in the Constitution of the United States. I hear Senators say all about me that the question of the status of Arkansas and of her relations to the Union is not presented upon this report; that whether she be a State of the United States or not the conclusion of the committee is yet the correct one, that these gentlemen are not entitled to their seats. How that can be possible I do not understand. If there be any political right given to a State it is the right to be represented in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, the point is this: not that Arkansas is or is not entitled to a representation, but the Constitution says each State shall be entitled to two Senators, to be chosen by the Legislature thereof. The committee have come to the conclusion that there was no Legislature which elected these two gentlemen. Whether there is a valid Legislature in Arkansas or not is not a question that we acted upon. The same question arose some years ago in Rhode Island, as is stated in the report, and the Senate decided that one of the bodies was not the Legislature and that the other was, and selected one of the two men. We thought the body which sent these gentlemen here was not the Legislature of the State of Arkansas; that is the point.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the committee charged with the authority of looking into and passing upon the returns of these candidates for seats here went away back of that, and really did look at and pass upon the returns of the members who convened at Little Rock, in Arkansas, and undertook to act as the Legislature of that State; and while they concede that upon the face of the credentials these gentlemen are entitled to seats here, they do substantially decide that the constituents who sent them here had no right to sit in Little Rock, and to officiate as the Legislature of Arkansas. They not only decide upon the claim of these gentlemen to seats here, but they decide upon the claim of representatives and senators who convened in the capital of that State, and undertook to act as the Legislature of that State.

I am not going to argue this question, for I am not prepared to argue it. It seems to me that a few statutes and a few very elementary principles settle the whole question. If it be conceded that Arkansas is a State of the Union and that she is entitled to a representation here, then I wish to look to this other statement presented by the committee, namely, that the constituency which elected these gentlemen was not a Legislature. Upon what evidence is that statement? So far as the proofs are concerned, the committee present us no evidence that there was any other Legislature for Arkansas than the very one which elected and returned these gentlemen. If you go outside of the proofs and look at the probabilities, I think we morally know that there was no other Legislature. What, then, was the objection to this body? Not that it was not loyal, nor that it did not represent the loyal people of Arkansas—

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator allow me? As I understand, the committee find that the people were not represented, that they were in duress and did not exercise their free will in the selection of a Legislature. I think that is the very point. Whether that is well found or badly found I cannot say.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand the report to controvert but what this Legislature was loyal, the members composing it were loyal, nor to controvert but what they represented the loyal people of Arkansas. It does intimate, it does perhaps state that only a portion of the people of Arkansas united in the choice of them, and it does perhaps state, and the fact may be that a portion of the loyal people did not participate in the election of these members; but how does that affect the question of the legitimacy of that Legislature? Suppose one, or ten, or one hundred, or one thousand, or fifty thousand men are held in duress at a given point of time, that being the only difficulty in the way, does that disqualify the residue and remainder from exercising all the functions, asserting all the rights which belong to them as citizens? While I am permitted to think and to speak and to act for myself in the State of Wisconsin, I do not know how my rights as a citizen of that State can be abridged by any duress that can be imposed upon all the rest of the people about me. So that the simple fact that a portion of the loyal people did not engage in this election, did not vote at it, it seems to me will not be contended by any one as being a reason for bastardizing the Legislature itself. It is not asserted by the committee as a reason why they deny to that body the character of a Legislature; that is not the reason upon which they ground their conclusions; but the reason they present is that Arkansas was at that time occupied by military force.

“At the time when the body which chose the claimants was elected, when it assembled, and at this time, the State of Arkansas is occupied by hostile armies which exercise supreme authority within the districts subject to their control. While a portion of Arkansas is at this very time, as the committee are informed, in the actual possession and subject to the control of the enemies of the United States; other parts of the State are only held in subordination to the laws of the Union by the strong arm of military power. While this state of things continues and the right to exercise armed authority over a large part of the State is claimed and exerted by the military power, it cannot be said that a civil government, set up and continued only by the sufferance of the military, is that republican form of government which the Constitution requires the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union."

The mistake into which I think the committee have fallen is the mistake of asserting that this civil government which was set up in Arkansas exists only by the sufferance of the military power. I showed you the other day, and you can see for yourselves if you look into the statute, that it existed by the express permission of the civil power of the United States, the legislative power of the United States, by virtue of an act passed many years ago still existing in full force. It is by the permission of that act of ours that that civil government was set up in Arkansas. It was not by the sufferance of the military power, but, on the contrary, that portion of the military power which permitted this civil government to exist there, was there only by permission of the same authority which permitted that Legislature to convene.

The committee seem to argue that because that civil government cannot stand alone, because it can only abide by the aid and support of the military force, therefore it ought not to be allowed to exercise the prerogatives and functions of a State. I think if that were true it would prove a great deal too much for us. We exist here to-day only by the aid and support of an army of a million men. True, they are not mustered about the capital. But remove your military from the field, and you will remove from this capital in a very short time. You have not a day's tenure of your power and authority here except through the aid and support of this very military force; and precisely the same military force that upholds your authority here in Washington upholds the authority of the Government which sent up these gentlemen from Arkansas, and upholds the power which sends Senators from Wisconsin and from New York. It was operating more immediately in the field from which these gentlemen come than it is in that from which I come; but it is precisely the same military force that upholds the civil authority in each of the States and in the United States from which all our powers spring.

Mr. President, there was a time when I think there was no Legislature in Arkansas, no power that could elect Senators, and when, of course, Arkansas could not have had a representation here; but that time I think passed by when a body did convene in the capital of the State, delegated by the people of the State, who chose and who did participate in the election of a Legislature. Then they had a Legislature, then they did present the features of a State. Prior to that time the people of Arkansas were either subject to an alien government, and one hostile to us, or they were without any government except what your captains and your colonels saw fit to furnish them. I think that those men who declared the independence of Arkansas destroyed the government of Arkansas as an American State; and I think when they destroyed that, if they did not wipe out of existence at the same time every particle of loyalty in the State, the duty devolved upon the supreme authority of the United States to furnish to whatever loyalty there was in the State a civil government and not a military government. That power we refused to exercise. That duty we utterly neglected to discharge. We left the loyal people of Arkansas without any protection or government except what they could get from the rebel government, and what they could get from military forces, until the military power of the United States drove the rebel forces from the State; and then the people, still resting under the authority of these statutes of the United States to which I have referred you, gathered themselves together, not deterred by any hostile power, and undertook to exercise precisely the functions, precisely the political rights that you had delegated to them and never had taken away from them. Now, is it fair to say to that people who have been true to you, that you will neither give them a civil government yourselves nor allow them to establish one for themselves? Is it right to say to a community, I care not how small it is, that because a large portion of their neighbors have become traitorous and rebellious, therefore they shall have none of the rights of American citizens? I hold that they have a right to a civil government. I hold that when the prerogatives of a State are destroyed, and the authorities of a State become openly hostile to the United States, it is our duty to interfere and to provide civil government for that portion which is true; but if we refuse that until the force which sustains the rebel authority is driven without the State, then I think we should permit to the loyal people remaining within the State the exercise of all those rights which we have delegated to them by these sanctions.

I am entirely conscious, Mr. President, that I have not made anything like a distinct and intelligible exposition of my own views on this matter. I believe them very thoroughly. I believe that to exclude these gentlemen from the seats they claim here will be the most serious political mistake we have made or that we can make. I do not fear what others seem to fear, that it will operate disastrously upon this one great cause in which we are engaged. I believe it will be a profound mistake; it will be a very dangerous precedent; I think it will operate to some extent to discourage what I understand to be the growing sentiment of loyalty in the State of Arkansas as well as in other States which have heretofore declared their independence of the United States; but we can correct that by some proper measures hereafter, so that I do not look for fatal results even from such a mistake as I think the Senate is about to make; but that it will be a mistake, I believe, as I said when I got up, with my whole mind and strength.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, entertaining the views that I have heretofore expressed in relation to the rights of the States in the anomalous condition in which they were placed by the act of those who attempted to destroy their connection with this Government, it may be supposed that a vote for this resolution would be inconsistent with those views. Impelled, however, by a sense of duty, not only duty to the Constitution and the obligations which I owe to the Federal compact, but by a sense of duty that I think we owe to the loyal people residing in these States, I cannot but concur with the committee in the resolution which they have submitted and which is now before the Senate.

It will be remembered by Senators that the act of secession itself was an overthrow of the then existing State governments within the States attempting to pass the ordinance of secession. It was necessary to repudiate the constitutions, the organic laws of the several States, in order to make secession effective, for in each and every one of them their existence as members of the Union was recognized, and obligations to the Constitution and laws of that Union were imposed by the several State constitutions. Therefore the constitutions of the States in existence at the secession have been overthrown by those who have usurped the power within those States.

Now, sir, what is the condition of Arkansas? The loyal people of Arkansas who have participated in the movement by which it is claimed Senators have been sent here to represent that State in this body, which is the representative of the States peculiarly in our system, did not resist the overthrow of their State constitution by those in rebellion, did not uphold and maintain that constitution, do not come here claiming to be a State with their constitution as it was prior to its overthrow or attempted overthrow by the secessionists, but they resort to the same revolutionary means as were resorted to by the secessionists to effect their purpose. A State in the sense in which we understand it, in other words in the constitutional sense, is not a mere district of country defined by boundaries with inhabitants upon it; but there is no such thing as a State known to us and to our system of government unless it has a written constitution that must be republican in form; and how can it be republican in form unless it proceeds from the great body of the people and is their act? By what right can twelve thousand people in Arkansas assume to deprive other loyal citizens, and for aught we know there may be double that number of loyal men deprived by this act of their government as it existed prior to the rebellion?

In what condition would the Senate of the United States find itself placed in the event of its coming to a different conclusion from that of the Committee on the Judiciary to whom this subject was referred? Suppose the rebellion should be extinguished in Arkansas by the next meeting of Congress, and suppose twenty-four thousand instead of twelve thousand loyal citizens of Arkansas should in accordance with the constitution as it existed prior to the rebellion elect at the times prescribed by law members to the Legislature of Arkansas, and that Legislature should attempt to elect Senators to fill the vacancy caused by the expulsion of their former Senators, Messrs. Mitchel and Sebastian, and claimants under that election should present themselves here as candidates for seats in the Senate of the United States, what would the Senate do with the gentlemen now here as the representatives of a revolutionary State government, for it is not pretended, I gather from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, that this change in the organic law of Arkansas was made in pursuance of constitutional provision. The constitution of Arkansas as it existed prior to the rebellion provided the means and the manner for its own amendment and change. From the necessity of the case, from the condition in which these people were placed at the time this movement organizing and creating a State government by means not known to the constitution and laws of Arkansas occurred, no such means could be resorted to as the constitution contemplated. Therefore this is not a case like any that has heretofore come before the Senate for its determination. It is not a case of a loyal people (for I hold that the State governments belong to the loyal people within the States, and in that I concur with the Senator from Kansas) coming here claiming representation under that State government which was adopted by the body of the people and which that act made republican in form, a State known to the Constitution and the constituted authorities of the Government of the United States; but it is a claim on the part of gentlemen to represent a State assumed to be a State, created by less than one fourth of the people of the State, and which if recognized by this Government deprives the remaining people within that State of representation; assuming them to be loyal to their Government as it existed prior to the rebellion, and which they have a right to maintain unless they prove to be the minority ascertained in accordance with the constitutional provision as it existed before the change was made.

I cannot therefore consent by an act of mine to do that which may deprive the body of the people of Arkansas of their representation in this body under a State recognized and known to the Constitution of the United States and the authorities of that Government. I concur with the Senator from Wisconsin that each State in this Union has a right to claim its representation here. It has the right under the Constitution. Arkansas has that right by having been admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States. The question is not whether the State of Arkansas is entitled to representation on this floor or not, but it is whether the gentlemen who claim to have seats and to be the representatives of the State of Arkansas are entitled to seats in this body. I maintain that the evidence before us shows that they are not and they cannot be. They come here, not as the representatives of the State of Arkansas as it existed; they come not here as the representatives of a State government which has been recently reorganized and changed by constitutional legal enactment; they come not here proceeding as the representatives of the great body of the people of the State of Arkansas, who alone can constitute a State government. I presume no Senator will contend that a State government set up within any of the States of this Union by less than one fourth of the inhabitants of that State, less than one fourth of the constitutional voters in a State, is a government republican in form. No matter what may be the provisions of its constitution, or however acceptable they may be, to constitute a government republican in form within the sense of the Constitution of the United States it must emanate from the body of the people; and no government constituted outside of law, in violation of law, by revolutionary proceedings, can be a government such as the Constitution of the United States recognizes as necessary for a State in the Union.

If these gentlemen had come here as the select representatives of the Legislature which met under the constitution as it existed, and which was adopted and ratified by the people of Arkansas, it would have been another and a very different question, and I imagine there would have been very little difference of view as to their right, so far as that question is concerned, to admission to seats in this body; but they come here as the representatives of a pretended government erected by less than one fourth of the people of the State they claim to represent—a government claiming the right, and if we admit and recognize it here will have the right, to be represented in this body to the exclusion of those who may be selected hereafter in that State under the constitution as it existed, by a much larger vote than that by which the constitution was adopted.

These reasons, Mr. President, compel me to vote for the resolution introduced by the Judiciary Committee. I cannot aid one fourth of the people of a State in overthrowing their State constitution. The end that is arrived at is the same whether it be done by those who are acting in rebellion or whether it be done by others who would resist a rebellion. Both accomplish the overthrow of the government which the people had established, and which the people have a right to claim at the hands of this Government that they shall be protected in the enjoyment and protection of. That is the meaning of the constitutional provision which we have that the Government of the United States shall guaranty to each State in this Union a republican form of government. It supposes a fore-existing government. It does not authorize the Government of the United States to create a State government. It supposes a State government created by the people for themselves, and it makes it the duty of the Federal Government to protect the people in the possession and enjoyment of that State government.

From the report of the committee in this case it appears that there were but twenty counties represented in this so-called convention which it is claimed has changed the organic law of Arkansas and established for these people a constitution other than the one which they have heretofore lived under and which they adopted for themselves. It further appears that there are fifty-four counties in the State; that there were fifty-four thousand electors in 1860, and that but twelve thousand votes were cast under this new constitution and for it. Thirty-four counties were without representatives.

Mr. TEN EYCK. There were forty-six counties represented in the Legislature.

Mr. CARLILE. Yes, sir. I go behind that Legislature. I am speaking of the revolutionary proceeding under which this Legislature was hatched. Twenty counties out of the fifty-four were represented in that convention. We do not know the number of votes given for the members who were sent to that convention. It does not appear from the report of the committee whether in all these twenty counties elections even were held; but for all that appears citizens of those several counties may have met at Little Rock and Fort Smith and elected delegates from the several counties even to this convention. We have been told that at Little Rock or Fort Smith, or probably at both of those places, at Little Rock certainly, I believe, several gentlemen called there by business or pleasure were elected to represent counties in which they had resided and in which elections could not have been held.

But, sir, the position in which the Senate would be placed by the recognition of the Legislature is the great controlling fact with me, and to which I have already referred. If this rebellion, so far as Arkansas is concerned, if not in the other States, should be suppressed by the next meeting of Congress, and the people of Arkansas, to the number of fifty-four thousand, or forty thousand, or thirty thousand, or twenty thousand should insist upon retaining their government as it existed prior to the rebellion, and should go on under it and elect a Legislature, and that Legislature should send Senators here, what would be the condition of the Senate? Would the Senate not feel bound to admit representatives under the government as it had existed, and how could they do it with the places filled by the representatives here of this revolutionary government set up by one fourth of the people of the State?

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to say that in my own view I do not hold these gentlemen to be representatives of the revolutionary government in Arkansas, but I hold them to be representatives of that government which is not revolutionary in Arkansas.

Mr. CARLILE. I deny the fact. The report of this committee says otherwise. The report of this committee says that gentlemen assuming to represent but twenty of the fifty-four counties of Arkansas met at Fort Smith, I believe, and there assumed to organize a State government. They assumed, not to organize a government under the government that the people of Arkansas had adopted, but they assumed to enact for the entire State of Arkansas and its entire population a new constitution, a new organic law, and create under that new constitution and new organic law a Legislature.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The committee is mistaken or the Senator is. The convention amended the old constitution and submitted the amendments to the people.

Mr. CARLILE. The old constitution can only be amended in one way; the Constitution of the United States can be amended in two ways; but suppose an attempt was made to amend it in any other mode than that provided in the instrument itself and you recognize it, would not such an amendment and such new constitution be a revolutionary government? Most unquestionably. Just so it is in Arkansas. The constitution of Arkansas provides the manner in which it shall be amended. If it is not a new government, but an amended constitution, the case of the Senators is much worse than I had supposed; for the constitution of 1836, which is the constitution for the State of Arkansas to-day, provides the mode in which it can be amended. It can be amended in that mode and in no other.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose the States of the Union without any action of Congress should get together of their own accord and amend the Constitution of the United States and adopt the amendments, does he deny that those amendments would be in force?

Mr. CARLILE. That is exactly what these rebellious States have done. Eleven of them have got together, and they adopted your Constitution almost literally, word for word, with fewer amendments, making much less important alterations and changes than this so-called convention has done with regard to the State of Arkansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But if all the States join in it, how then?

Mr. CARLILE. If all the people of Arkansas had got together, if all the counties had been represented, or if all of them could have had representation there and adopted a new organic law, it would have been a very different thing. That, however, would have been a proceeding outside of the State government then existing.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I understand the Senator from Virginia to admit the correctness of my position that the government of Arkansas belonged to the loyal people.

Mr. CARLILE. Certainly.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If all the loyal people participated in this proceeding, can he doubt its legality, if there were only twelve thousand out of fifty-four thousand loyal?

Mr. CARLILE. That is a question which we cannot settle here. We have no data. For aught that appears, three fourths of the loyal people did not and could not participate in this so-called convention. For aught that it appears those who elected these very delegates to this so-called convention were not qualified electors under the constitution of Arkansas. I take it for granted that they were not, because one of the provisions of the constitution of Arkansas is that no one employed in the military or naval service of the United States shall vote; and we are told in this very report that every citizen of Arkansas that could be received, and was not excluded because of bodily infirmity, had gone into the military service of the United States; and I take it for granted they are the loyal people of Arkansas. The constitution of the State of Arkansas expressly excludes them in the military or naval service from the right of electors. I do not intend to approve, it is not my purpose to approve, any such constitutional provision or to condemn it. There it is. We are maintaining the constitution and laws of the country. We are resisting by all the military power of the country revolution and rebellion. It is because these men have attempted to resist constitutional authority that it has become necessary for the Government of the United States to employ its military power to enforce obedience to constitutions and laws. For aught that we know, for aught that we can know, more than twelve thousand of the loyal people of Arkansas may claim the rights secured to them under the constitution which they had adopted, and to preserve which, as well as the Constitution of the United States, they have resisted the power of those who controlled their State; they may claim under that constitution representation in this body; and the Senate of the United States ought not, under the circumstances, when they see that the representation they would now grant would be a representation springing from a government other than that which existed at the beginning of this rebellion, a government organized, not by the body of the people, but by less than one fourth of the people, to place themselves, by recognizing that government, in the situation to exclude from representation upon this floor those who have the right to demand it.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask the Senator whether the right to representation in this body is given to the people of Arkansas by the constitution of that State or by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CARLILE. The right to representation in this body is given by the Constitution of the United States, but to whom? To the State. What is the State? The loyal people of the State, those who have a right to demand that their own State government shall be preserved to them by you as well as that your Government shall be preserved to them by you. Are you going to place yourself in a situation to exclude for aught you know three fourths of that loyal people by recognizing a government set up against their will? for we have a right so to suppose, as they were not represented in the convention that assumed to make it, and have never had an opportunity to ratify or reject it by a vote upon it. That is the question that I put to the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. I wish simply to say that I do not think the validity of the election of these gentlemen depends upon the character of that convention which assembled at Fort Smith. All the rights I claim for these gentlemen and all the rights I claim for the loyal people of Arkansas are in them by the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in accordance with it. Those laws, if they secure any political right, secure the right of representation, and that right is given to men who are in allegiance to the Government of the United States, and not to those who are in arms against it. To the one the character of citizens and the prerogatives of citizens are given; to the other, simply death.

Mr. CARLILE. Does not the Constitution of the United States provide that that representation shall be secured here, by and through the action of the Legislature of the State?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLILE. Then it is the duty of the Senator from Wisconsin to show that the body which has sent these gentlemen here is the constitutional Legislature, the legal Legislature of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOWE. The broad seal of the State of Arkansas I suppose was, if not conclusive, at least prima facie evidence of that fact, and a person who signs himself as the Governor of Arkansas, using the seal of Arkansas, certifies that these men were elected by the Legislature of Arkansas to be Senators of the United States, and I know of no evidence to disprove or to dispute the truth of this certificate.

If there be such an organization as the State of Arkansas, which seems to be conceded by this report as well as by almost all the Senators who have spoken upon it, they had the right to elect a Legislature, and that right was confined exclusively to the loyal portion of that population. To the disloyal portion there was no political right whatever reserved. It is not intimated either by the committee, or by the Senator from Virginia, or by any one else, that there was any fraud practiced in the election of this Legislature. It was free to all the loyal people of Arkansas. They all participated in it who chose to do so, unless some portion of them were deprived of that privilege by a hostile force. The Senator from Virginia intimates that there might have been three fourths of the loyal people of Arkansas deprived of the privilege of participating in that election by this hostile force. There is no evidence of that, and if the fact were so, does that fact deprive the loyal portion of the prerogatives of citizens?

Mr. CARLILE. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the point I endeavored to make. The Legislature of which the Senator speaks was not a Legislature under the constitution of Arkansas; it was a Legislature organized by the representatives of twenty counties, as we are told, under what was called a constitution adopted by less than one fourth of the voters of Arkansas. That is the point to which I wish to call the Senator's attention. I would concur with the Senator if this Legislature had been the Legislature of the State, if the loyal people had a right to elect delegates to it, and had a right to claim representation under it; but it is because it is not the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, as we are informed, that I object to it.

Mr. HOWE. My point is that every American State has the right to a Legislature. We are bound to assume that there was by the laws of Arkansas some day fixed on which the choice of a Legislature should be made, and we have no evidence but that this choice was made on the very day fixed by the Legislature.

Mr. CARLILE. You have right the reverse. The constitution of Arkansas prescribes the day when the Legislature shall meet.

Mr. HOWE. I will not go into a discussion of what is the constitution of Arkansas. You concede that Arkansas is a State. I say that one of her prerogatives as a State is that her people shall be represented in a Legislature, and one of the prerogatives of the Legislature is the choice of Senators. We are not here to settle what is the organic law of Arkansas; we are to settle only what is the organic law of the United States, and the statutes passed in accordance with that organic law. But, as I said before, there is not a particle of evidence but that every loyal man who chose to participate in the choice of this Legislature did participate in it. If anybody was prevented he was prevented not by the authorities of the United States, nor the loyal authorities of Arkansas, but by authorities or by forces disloyal to both Arkansas and the United States; and I say the duress imposed by one citizen upon one hundred citizens, or upon one thousand citizens, cannot do anything to deprive others upon whom that restraint is not imposed from exercising all the prerogatives of citizens.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] is paired on this question with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.] He would, if here, vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sainsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Doolittle, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, and Pomerooy—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Grimes, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Richardson, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—16.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the usual mileage of Senators to Eliza Baxter and William M. Fishback respectively as claimants for seats in the Senate from Arkansas at the first session of this Congress.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 494) to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes, after full and free conference, have agreed upon a report which is signed by all the members of the committee of both branches. The report can be read by the Secretary, if desired, or I can answer any questions that Senators may feel disposed to ask me in reference to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will give us an account of the state of the bill. We can never understand it by merely hearing the action on the various amendments by their numbers read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The report is voluminous; a great many of the amendments were merely verbal, and none of very serious importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the reading of the report at large desired by any Senator? The Chair hears no request for it; the reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer any question with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is it with our amendment in regard to the duty on railroad iron?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That amendment was agreed to by the House of Representatives and therefore is not in the report of the committee of conference. I suppose my friend from Rhode Island wished to know in regard to the exception of raw cotton.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wished to make that inquiry.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It stands as the Senator desires.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask how brimstone stands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate recede from that amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. And clove stems?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The two points to which the Senator's questions relate were of some consequence. The Senate made a very large increase in the duty on sulphur. From that amendment the Senate recede and the committee on the part of the Senate felt obliged to recede. My honorable friend from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] who moved to put on the additional duty, was convinced by the facts which appeared before the committee of conference that it would not be wise to put on a larger duty than was imposed by the House of Representatives. The reason is that sulphur enters into the composition of an immense number of articles, all the acids, &c., besides being used very largely in manufactures. The result would be that if we made the change proposed by the Senate we should have to go over the bill and remodel it in many particulars, and not only that, but have to impose additional duties on a great number of articles with regard to which we had not the necessary information to act, and it is so late in the session that we cannot think of doing that. These views were satisfactory to my honorable friend from New York. With regard to myself, I was before of opinion that we could not properly do more than double the present duty, which was done by the House bill.

With reference to the spices, the Senate recede to a certain extent. A small additional duty is imposed, I think about five cents a pound on most of them, on some a little more. Cloves are put at twenty per cent. additional and clove stems at ten, which was all we supposed they could bear. The other spices were raised about in proportion; nutmegs a little more. Nutmegs stood before at thirty cents; the House of Representatives proposed seventy-five; the committee fix them at fifty.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] asks in regard to cutlery. I only remember that the subject was not before the committee of conference, and hence whatever action was in regard to it, it was concurred in by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the honorable Senator how the duty on salt is regulated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The duty on salt is not exactly as either House proposed. It is fixed at twenty-four cents a hundred pounds in sacks and eighteen cents in bulk.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 446) to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. C. COLE of California, and Mr. J. W. McCLURG of Missouri, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 411) to encourage immigration, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. W. WINDOM of Minnesota, and Mr. J. E. ENGLISH of Connecticut, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House (No. 11) in relation to the claim of Carmack and Ramsey, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. J. B. ALLEY of Massachusetts, and Mr. R. B. VAN VALKENBURGH of New York, managers at the same on its part.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 438) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and on motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HARLAN, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. CONNESS.

NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the same subject-matter to which I alluded before; the so-called report made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] from the select committee on naval supplies. I intimated to the Senate when I was on the floor before that I was taken entirely by surprise by the report having been made when it was made. As I understand, no report on the subject was to be made until to-morrow morning when the views of all the members of the committee could be submitted together. The Senator from New Hampshire and myself have had a conversation on this subject, and he asserts that he understood he was to be permitted to put in his report this morning, and that the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] and my own views were to be submitted to-morrow morning. With this assurance of the Senator, I forbear to make any further statement on the subject, as the Senator has agreed to withdraw the report for the present, there having been a misunderstanding on the subject, and to-morrow morning the views of the different members of the committee will be presented together with the bill upon which the committee have agreed.

Mr. HALE. I was not in when the Senator from Wisconsin first spoke on this subject, but it was reported to me that he said I was not authorized to make any such report from the committee. The report is the report of the committee; but I have no choice whether it be made to-day or to-morrow, and therefore I move that it be recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 406) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that motion will not prevail, and for a reason which I shall proceed to state. Last year, at the time that General Lee invaded Pennsylvania, the President of the United States issued his proclamation calling for emergency men for the occasion to repel that invasion. That was followed by the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania calling on the people of that State to furnish a certain number of men for the same purpose. There was no provision made at that time to pay those troops; but patriotic citizens and institutions of the State, the banks especially, came forward and advanced the money on the express agreement made with the Secretary of War that the proper appropriation should be made by Congress in order to refund and repay them the money actually advanced. The House of Representatives have passed a bill for that purpose, and it is now before the Senate, and has been for some time. I desire that that bill be taken up. I do not think it will provoke debate, because there is no difficulty about the accounts; the money has been paid; the accounts have been filed in the proper office here and audited by the proper officers, and there is no possible dispute about that part of the case. I desire an opportunity to take up that bill, and I think the Senate ought to grant me that privilege. I have not been in the habit of delaying the action of the body either by long-winded speeches or by capricious objections to anything; and I think now that I ought to be entitled to this privilege. Certainly, coming from the State we do, representing three million people, my colleague and I together have taken up less of the time of this body than those who represent States not larger than one of our counties.

Mr. FOSTER. The State which I have the honor in part to represent certainly is not nearly as large as that represented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and his claims as representing so large a population are undoubtedly worthy of great consideration. I do not know that his other remarks in regard to the reticence which he and his colleague have observed during the session reflect any more severely upon my colleague and myself than upon members from other States; and I do not know under the circumstances, although our State is smaller, that I am not entitled in this instance to just about the same consideration that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has. But if I were not, and if this question stood with reference to the interest of Pennsylvania alone, I make bold to say, in the presence of the Senators from that State, that the bill which I have moved to take up concerns that very State more than the bill which the honorable Senator urges. There are more maimed brave men whom my bill will relieve belonging to Pennsylvania than there are men who cannot afford to wait that will be relieved by his bill. There are more widows and orphans in Pennsylvania whom my bill will relieve than there are who will be gladdened by the passage of his. The State of Pennsylvania is a great State, a powerful State, and she has sent her hosts to this war; few States, perhaps none, have sent more men than Pennsylvania. The bill which I now ask the Senate to take up proposes to provide for those who have been maimed in this war, and for the widows and children of the men who have died, and who have been left houseless and penniless. I know it will not provide for them as much relief as I would be glad to provide, but still it will provide some. The bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Pensions does not propose to go as far as the original House bill; but it goes so far that there are fifteen thousand cases pending before the Pension Bureau which it will enable to be relieved.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire, with the Senator's permission, to make a remark.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It will be a great pity if we waste our time in debating the order in which business shall be transacted. I think there is time to pass both these bills; and as the Senator who has the floor made his motion first, I think the better mode of proceeding would be to take up his bill and pass it, and then take up the other bill, and get both through without wasting time.

Mr. FOSTER. I can accede to the suggestion readily, and I will also say that this bill has been up and has been amended, so that I think we can pass it without much more discussion.

Mr. COWAN. When the Senator from Connecticut made his motion, I had no idea of the kind of bill he wished to take up. I could not hear what he said. I did not know whether it was a general bill or a private bill. I have yielded, I think at least half a dozen times heretofore, to other gentlemen to bring up their bills; and I desire now to say that I shall insist hereafter that at least some portion of the time of the Senate shall be devoted to the consideration of business in which I am interested.

The motion of Mr. FOSTER was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 406) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. When the bill was under consideration before all the amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions were adopted except the last, and the question is now on its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The pending amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the widows and children of colored soldiers who have been, or who may be hereafter, killed, or who have died or may hereafter die of wounds received in battle, or who have died or may hereafter die of disease contracted in the military service of the United States, and in the line of duty, shall be entitled to receive the pensions now provided by law, without other proof of marriage than that the parties had habitually recognized each other as man and wife, and lived together as such for a definite period, not less than two years, to be shown by the affidavits of credible witnesses: Provided, That if such parties resided in any State in which their marriage may have been legally solemnized, the usual evidence shall be required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one amendment reported by the committee which I feel it my duty to move a reconsideration of. It is the amendment striking out the fourth section of the bill. Perhaps, however, it will be better to wait until the bill gets into the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to reserve from the general vote of concurrence the amendment which I have indicated.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The excepted amendment was to strike out the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That section twelve of the act to grant pensions, approved July 14, 1862, is hereby repealed. And the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized and empowered to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government through the Pension Office, and to aid in prosecuting any persons so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee reported that it was advisable to strike out that section; but the Commissioner of Pensions is very decidedly of opinion that the section ought to remain. He thinks that the appointment of an agent which costs the Department some $2,500 a year in salary and expenses can be dispensed with, not only without detriment but perhaps with advantage to the office, because the clerks who discover the frauds in the documents before them can more readily detect those concerned in them than a third person who is not conversant with them. By non-concurring in this proposed amendment the bill will be left in this respect as it came from the other House, which I am satisfied will be better than to strike out the section.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose this amendment to come in at the end of the seventh section:

That in all cases of second marriage the same construction shall be given to the Navy as is given to the Army pension laws; and divorce for fault of the husband shall be no bar to the claim of any applicant if she be otherwise entitled.

I have consulted with the Senator from Iowa who is familiar with this question, and he sees no objection to the amendment. I did not understand the subject quite well enough to frame the amendment to my entire satisfaction, and so I left it to him. I think it is right. I will state what it is to provide for.

In Army pension cases, if the widow marries her pension is suspended during the coverture, but in the case of the death of her second husband so that she becomes a widow again, her pension is restored to her; but that provision does not extend to the case of Navy pensions given to widows. In the case of a Navy pension to a widow, if she marry again her pension is gone forever, and even if her second husband should die she has not the benefit of a restoration of the pension as in the case of an Army pensioner.

The latter part of the amendment is to provide for those cases both in the Army and Navy where the widow having married again becomes a femme sole by divorce from her second husband for the fault of her husband. It seems to me to be an equitable right, and I can see no objection to the provision.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there should be uniformity, but I doubt whether it be advisable to change the law so that after a widow becomes a widow the second time she should be restored to the pension list as before. I think the law is pretty liberal in providing for the widow while she remains a widow, the presumption being that if she marries again her support will be otherwise provided for. The death of her second husband or her subsequent divorce I do not think should restore her to the pension list. There may be good reasons in some cases why it should be done, and there may be equally good reasons why in other cases it ought not to be done. I doubt whether we should improve the law by the alteration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The number of cases in the Navy is exceedingly small as compared with the Army cases, and I cannot see why the same rule should not apply to both. It may be that this privilege ought not to be given to a widow in the case of an Army pension, but if it ought to be, then clearly it ought to be in the case of the Navy pension also.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very important to settle this question first as to what the law now is in regard to military pensions. If the Senator from Indiana is right in that regard, I think his amendment is manifestly proper. My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, seems to entertain a doubt on the subject as to whether that is the law or not.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the law. I have examined it and I have had it executed many a time.

Mr. FOSTER. In all cases of our private bills we always say that we grant a pension to the widow for such an amount to continue during her widowhood. In case of her remarriage that pension stops, and in case of the death of her husband it does not revive.

Mr. GRIMES. That applies to pensions that are granted by special act of Congress, but they are as one sand on the sea-shore in comparison with the number that are granted under the general law. If it be true that under the general law a widow who is entitled to a pension and is drawing it, and marries again and again becomes a widow, is then entitled to the renewal of her pension, it seems to me the same rule ought to apply in the Navy.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very certain that whether the law be so now or not, such a provision as this introduced by the Senator from Indiana would be inconsistent with this bill, the sixth section of which provides:

That on the remarriage of any widow receiving a pension, such pension shall terminate, and shall not be renewed should she again become a widow.

The amendment would be inconsistent, therefore, with the body of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. That settles it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had not noticed that provision of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I think if such a construction has been put upon the law it is a vicious one, and this law will correct it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the committee insist upon that change with respect to that class of pensioners, of course I do not intend to interfere with what the chairman of the committee thinks is right.

Mr. FOSTER. I do think it right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (No. 559) to quiet the titles of lands within the Rancho Laguna Santos Calle, in the State of California—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 561) to authorize the United States to acquire land in Wallabout bay, belonging to the city of Brooklyn, and to authorize the exchange of other lands therefor—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 497) in relation to the village of Deposit, Delaware county, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 540) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 532) to establish certain post roads;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 23) for the relief of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) for the relief of Mary Kellogg.

EXPENSES OF PENNSYLVANIA MILITIA.

Mr. COWAN. I now move to postpone all prior orders and take up Housebill No. 117.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, the first section of which proposes to appropriate the sum of $700,000 to reimburse the institutions and individuals who advanced the money to pay the Pennsylvania soldiers who were called out by the proclamation of the President of the United States and the Governor of Pennsylvania to repel the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the rebel forces under General Lee in the summer of 1863, and who were in actual service of the United States, to be paid to the Governor of Pennsylvania in trust for the above-mentioned purpose; but the expenses of none of the militia of any State are to be paid under this act who refused to be mustered into the service of the United States.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment to strike out the second section, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to defray the expenses incurred in raising, equipping, transporting, and paying the militia men, militia, and volunteers called out and in actual service of the United States, whether regularly mustered in or not, in repelling rebel raids and invasions of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the other loyal States and Territories, the sum $15,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said expenses to be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed in the proper offices in the Treasury, and passed upon by the Second Auditor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I wish to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill. It is to strike out all after the word "that" and to insert:

To reimburse the States, institutions, and individuals who advanced the money to pay the Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey soldiers who were called out by the proclamation of the President of the United States, or at the request of the Secretary of War, by the Governors of the said States respectively, to repel the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the rebel forces under General Lee, in the summer of 1863, and who were in actual service of the United States, whether regularly mustered in or not, the sum of $1,200,000, of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to be paid, upon the settlement of the accounts for such service in the proper Department, to the Governors of Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey in trust for the above-mentioned purpose.

I simply offer this as a substitute for the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania to reach the whole case. The first section, and the only section now in the bill, provides for the reimbursement of Pennsylvania for money paid to her own troops called out to repel the invasion of last year. Troops were called out from the State of New York and the State of New Jersey under the orders of the War Department and upon the request of the Governor of Pennsylvania, and the object of my amendment is in one bill to secure the payment of the troops from each of these States for the services they rendered on that occasion as well as to the troops of the State of Pennsylvania alone.

Mr. COWAN. I certainly have no objection in the world that the troops from New Jersey and New York shall be paid equally with those of Pennsylvania; and if my honorable friend desires to attain that result and will put it in the shape of a separate section to be added to this bill I shall have no objection to offer; but the cases are different. In the case of Pennsylvania, troops were called upon by the President and by the Governor, but there being no appropriation to pay for them, certain banks and individuals came forward and advanced the money upon the promise of the executive department of the Government that they would ask for an appropriation to pay it. The money has been paid, the accounts have been audited, and almost the precise sum fixed for that purpose.

It will be observed by the Senate that there is a proviso to the first which is now the only section of the bill proposing to pay the Pennsylvania troops, that no troops shall be paid unless they were mustered into the service of the United States, or rather that no troops shall be paid who refused to be mustered into the service of the United States. Now, as the Pennsylvania troops were actually mustered in and have complied with all the requisitions of the General Government to entitle them to be paid by it, it would be perhaps improper, and I might also say unfair, to ask me to blend with this section a proposition from other States whose troops may have refused to be mustered in, because it might endanger the passage of the whole in the other House.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I am sure I have no other motive in introducing this amendment by way of substitute than to see that fair and even-handed justice is done. The Senator from Pennsylvania prefers that this claim on the part of the States of New York and New Jersey should come in the shape of a separate section. He thinks there is a difference between the claim raised on the part of the State of Pennsylvania and the claim on the part of the two States of New York and New Jersey, and that the claim on the part of his State is rather more meritorious for the reasons that he has stated. I might say in advance that I do not understand exactly how that could come from the mouth of the Senator from Pennsylvania, when we seek to have the troops from these two other States paid for services rendered out of their own States and in the State of Pennsylvania, upon the most urgent request and appeals that our troops should go there for the purpose of rescuing the State from the invasion of the rebel army.

Mr. COWAN. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not misrepresent what I have said. I have not said that the services rendered by the Pennsylvania men were more meritorious than those of New York or New Jersey. On the contrary, I think I expressed a very different idea; but what I meant to say was that the claims were different. The troops called out by the Governor of Pennsylvania were mustered into the service of the United States. I do not know whether the troops that came over from New Jersey and New York were mustered in or not; they may have been or may not have been; but I observe that the House of Representatives tacked this proviso to the section which I desire to pass, and it is from that indication of the mind of the House that I am fearful if these claims are blended with that of Pennsylvania the whole may fail—not that I desire the troops from New York and New Jersey not to be paid or those States indemnified. I do not know how the fact may be as regards the mustering-in of their troops.

Mr. TEN EYCK. My object was simply to bring this matter before the Senate, and to show in a very few words why I thought if any payment was to be made at this time on account of these services, which were so essential during the last year in stopping the progress of the rebel army northward, the appropriation should be applied at the same time to the payment of the troops of the States of New York and New Jersey, who went to defend Pennsylvanians upon their own soil, and the most of whom, I believe I can say without boasting, were on the ground before the troops of Pennsylvania were there. I do not complain of it; but it certainly would have been more graceful on the part of the constituted authorities of Pennsylvania, who made that appeal to our troops during that period, when they presented these claims for settlement, not to have left us out in the cold.

But the Senator sees a distinction or difference between the claims. In the first place, with respect to the Pennsylvania troops, the money to pay the expenses incurred in calling them into the field, was loaned to the State, and advanced by individuals and institutions; in the case of New York and New Jersey they paid the money directly out of the State treasury. I cannot see any distinction or difference or any equity in the claim on the part of Pennsylvania over the claims of the States of New York and New Jersey in this respect. It matters not, so far as the money is concerned in this particular, whether the money was advanced to the government of Pennsylvania by individuals, and was paid over by the government to defray the expenses of her own troops, or whether New York and New Jersey took the money immediately out of their own treasury, and advanced the money necessary to fit out these troops who were called out and went to the protection of the State of Pennsylvania. I see no equity in the case of Pennsylvania that will override the equity of the claim on the part of the States of New York and New Jersey in this respect.

But the Senator sees another difference. He thinks there is a difference between the merit of the claim on the part of Pennsylvania and the two other States to which I have referred, because in the case of the Pennsylvania troops they were actually mustered into the service of the United States, and he does not know how it was with regard to the troops of New York and New Jersey. I may perhaps be pardoned for referring for a few moments to copies of some of the documents on this subject for the purpose of informing the Senator as to the true state of the facts with respect to my own State at least; and I have no doubt they are precisely the same in the case of New York. I have no doubt, the telegraphic dispatches being sent under the same circumstances and under a pressing exigency to the Governors of New York and New Jersey, that they were identically the same. I desire to read those dispatches to the Senate:

HARRISBURG, June 15, 1863.

Governor JOEL PARKER:

This State is threatened with invasion by a large force, and we are raising troops as rapidly as possible to resist them. I understand there are three regiments of your troops at Beverly waiting to be mustered out. Could an arrangement be made with you and the authorities at Washington by which the service of those regiments could be had for the present emergency? Please advise immediately.

A. G. CURTIN,

Governor of Pennsylvania.

The regiments here referred to were regiments that had come back from the front of battle with decimated and thinned ranks, and many of the men bearing the scars of battle upon their persons, and all of them anxious to return to their homes and families. Here is the answer of the Governor of New Jersey:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,

TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, June 15, 1863.

His Excellency A. G. CURTIN,

Governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburg:

Your dispatch is received. One regiment has already volunteered and no doubt others can be sent. Where shall they report and to whom? To whom shall they apply for transportation from Philadelphia? Answer.

JOEL PARKER.

Here is a dispatch from the Secretary of War to the Governor of New Jersey:

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

The movements of the rebel forces in Virginia are now sufficiently developed to show that General Lee with his whole army is moving forward to invade the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other States. The President, to repel this invasion promptly, has called upon Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Western Virginia, for one hundred thousand volunteers for six months unless sooner discharged. It is important to have the largest possible force in the least time, and if other States would furnish militia for a short time to be credited on the draft, it would greatly advance the object. Will you please inform me immediately what number, in answer to a special call of the President, you can raise and forward of militia or volunteers without bounty, for six months, unless sooner discharged, and to be credited on the draft of your State?

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, June 15, 1863.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War, Washington:
Your dispatch is received. Every means will be taken to ascertain how many men can be raised for six months. You will be notified as soon as it is ascertained. In the mean time am I authorized to delay the muster out of nine months' men at present in this State, and send them to Governor Curtin to assist in repelling the invasion of Pennsylvania? These regiments have been sent to be mustered out, but are volunteering to go to Pennsylvania for the emergency, and Governor Curtin is anxious for them. Answer immediately.

JOEL PARKER.

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1863.

Governor PARKER:

Your telegram received. You will please forward to Pennsylvania all the troops you can, directing them to report to Major General Couch, commanding the department, for Governor Curtin.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HARRISBURG, June 16, 1863.

Hon. JOEL PARKER, Governor:

Please instruct colonels of regiment to procure transportation by Pennsylvania railroad, Philadelphia, to Harrisburg. The colonel's requisition and receipt to railroad company will be sufficient. Send all you can immediately to this point, and telegraph superintendent Pennsylvania railroad, Philadelphia. Permit me to thank you for prompt attention.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, June 16, 1863.

His Excellency Governor CURTIN,
Harrisburg, Pennsylvania:

The nine months' regiments now in the State awaiting discharge will be forwarded as fast as possible. I issue proclamation to-morrow for citizens to organize for assistance of Pennsylvania, and will send them to you for the present emergency as State militia. Can I promise them United States pay and rations until they can be replaced by six months' volunteers? If so, must they be mustered into United States service, and for how short a time? I hope to be able to send you some twelve thousand men.

JOEL PARKER.

HARRISBURG, June 16, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

The people of this State are under obligations to you for your promptness and energy in organizing and forwarding men to this place. General Couch will have the best possible care taken of them. The question of details of which you inquire will have to be determined by the War Department at Washington. Telegraph orders from Secretary of War to General Couch this evening seem to cover all the points you refer to.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

Here is a dispatch from the adjutant general of New Jersey to the adjutant general of Pennsylvania:

TRENTON, June 17, 1863.

General H. L. RUSSELL,

Adjutant General, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania:

The twenty-third New Jersey regiment (returned volunteers) left for Harrisburg at five o'clock p. m. to-day, three hundred strong. Two companies of the State militia go at nine a. m. to-morrow. The others will be forwarded by companies as fast as they can be equipped. I thought best not to delay for regimental organization, but will perfect that in the field. Members of the twenty-third on furlough will be forwarded to join the regiment.

R. F. STOCKTON, Jr.,
Adjutant General New Jersey Militia.

HARRISBURG, June 19, 1863.

R. F. STOCKTON, Jr., Adjutant General:

I arrived with my command at this city at twelve o'clock last night. Company B, Captain Marshall, arrived at three o'clock this morning.

W. R. MURPHY.

TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, June 20, 1863.

His Excellency Governor CURTIN,
Harrisburg, Pennsylvania:

I have been informed that the urgent need of a volunteer militia force to aid in repelling an invasion of your State has passed, and that you do not wish any more State militia organized for temporary service. Please inform me if this is so, as in that case I will detain the troops that are now preparing to start and will proceed to organize six months' or three years' troops for the United States service.

JOEL PARKER.

HARRISBURG, June 20, 1864.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER, Governor:

The rebels are still in the State, and are on our border in force. I think you should not discontinue your preparations. Send troops to this point, unless the authorities at Washington direct otherwise.

A. G. CURTIN.

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, June 20, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER:

Will it be possible for your troops to remain with us during the present emergency whatever its duration may be? If not, for what time will they be mustered into service? Our militia are being mustered to serve during the present emergency, its termination to be fixed by my order, and the arrangement is approved by the War Department. I assure you I will not detain them longer than the necessity for their presence exists.

A. G. CURTIN.

PITTSBURG, June 20, 1863.

Hon. JOEL PARKER, Governor:

My regiment en route home volunteered in Pennsylvania's defense, were accepted, and are now at Wheeling. Will be home shortly.

G. W. MINDIL,
Colonel Twenty-Seventh New Jersey Volunteers.

HARRISBURG, June 23, 1863.

Governor JOEL PARKER:

Have seen Governor Curtin. Enemy advancing in heavy force. He wishes to retain the services of the men now here as militia of New Jersey and will subsidize them. Captain Murphy prefers not to go home under the circumstances, as do the men. Governor Curtin will answer your letter fully and I will return with it at one p. m. to-morrow. Answer what I shall do with the order.

S. M. DICKINSON,
Buckhart House.

HARRISBURG, June 24, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER:

I answer by your Secretary. Meantime the enemy is advancing. He is now at Shippensburg in force, and I trust you will continue to raise troops. I send messenger to Washington to ask that your troops be received for limited time or for this emergency, and if possible without muster into the service of the United States.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

There is the point. Here is the answer:

HARRISBURG, June 26, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

The enemy is in possession of the State from Carlisle to the Maryland line. He occupies the country in force. I trust you will not relax your efforts to help a sister State and kindred people.

A. G. CURTIN.

I will not say that in framing this bill and bringing it here for settlement he has forgotten "a sister State and kindred people" who went to their assistance, but whose names are not included in this bill for payment and satisfaction of their services. But here is another dispatch from Governor Curtin to Governor Parker:

HARRISBURG, June 27, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER, Governor New Jersey:

General Couch has been authorized to take into service in his department any troops whatever, mustered into United States service or not. The rebels are here in force, and we certainly need troops.

A. G. CURTIN.

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

General Couch is authorized to receive any troops that may be offered to serve under his command whether sworn into the United States service or not. Please send any militia or other force at your disposal.

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, June 29, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

We have most reliable information that the enemy reoccupy the north portion of this State with a force of not less than ninety thousand men, with over two hundred pieces of artillery, as counted by trustworthy persons. Lee is in the State. We are expecting an attack at this point hourly. We now certainly require the aid of the people of New Jersey. Do not relax your efforts to arouse your people. Let me hear from you.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

HARRISBURG, July 2, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER, Governor of New Jersey:

How soon will you send forward more troops? I cannot magnify the necessity for their presence at the earliest possible moment.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor.

TRENTON, July 2, 1863.

His Excellency Governor CURTIN, Harrisburg:

I am doing all I can to raise troops. They are coming in slowly. I will send as fast as possible by companies.

JOEL PARKER.

After reading these dispatches which show the urgent appeals of the Governor of Pennsylvania upon the Executive of the State of New Jersey for troops to come forward to aid in repelling that invasion, when we see the inquiries made on the part of the Executive of New Jersey of the Executive of Pennsylvania and the Secretary of War whether these troops could be received for a temporary period without being actually mustered into the service of the United States, and when we see that Governor Curtin asked for, and the Secretary of War directed, that these troops should be sent and should receive pay without being mustered into the United States service and actually sworn into that service, although they were sworn to serve during the period of their enlistment, I ask whether I need add another syllable to show that the claim on the part of the States of New York and New Jersey is at least as strong and meritorious as the claim on the part of the State of Pennsylvania to have their troops paid under a bill of this kind?

The expense to which the State of New Jersey has been put amounts to between fifty and sixty thousand dollars, as appears by a letter which I have here from the quartermaster general of the State. This account has not yet been audited and adjusted in the War Department; but I provide in the substitute I have offered that these troops shall be paid an amount not exceeding such a sum as may be found due upon an account being taken in the proper Department. Surely there can be no harm arising from the passage of a bill so framed; and surely there can be no justice in requiring this matter to go over until the next session of Congress because the accounts have not actually been adjusted. If we do not present our accounts, and they are not properly settled and adjusted, we can have no benefit under the bill as I propose to amend it.

With respect to the argument that the whole bill may be defeated if we tack on the claims of these two States to the claim of the State of Pennsylvania, I submit most respectfully to my friend from the State of Pennsylvania under the circumstances of this whole case as contained in this record, I should not think he would want his own troops paid before the troops of the States of New York and New Jersey, who were on the ground before the troops of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill was referred to the Committee on Finance. The second section of the bill, which makes an appropriation of $15,000,000 for various purposes, gave rise to a great deal of discussion. I examined the matter at that time for the purpose of getting at some rule about it for the satisfaction of the claims of the States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. There is no doubt that the militia of those States ought to be paid for the services actually rendered by them in the invasion of General Lee. They were services patriotically, efficiently, and properly rendered in time of great public danger, especially on the part of the State of New York. I believe her volunteers were sooner at Harrisburg than those of any part of Pennsylvania, and deserve the highest credit. With a view, therefore, to avoid the objection made by the Senator from New Jersey that the bill confines the appropriation to the State of Pennsylvania, I have drawn an amendment which satisfies my mind and perhaps will satisfy his. It will cover the three States and all the militia called out by them. I propose to offer three amendments. If they should be adopted the bill will read in this way:

That to pay the militia duly called out to repel the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the rebel forces under General Lee in the summer of 1863, and who were in actual service of the United States, the sum of $700,000, of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated to be paid to the said militia, or, where they have been paid, the Governor of the State to which such militia belongs, in trust for the State, institutions, or individuals who advanced the money to pay the same: Provided, That the expenses of none of the militia of any of the States shall be paid under this act who refused to be mustered into the service of the United States: And provided further, That only so much shall be allowed and paid to such militia as would have been allowed and paid to other military forces in the service of the United States of the same grade.

I think that will cover the case. The same rule has been applied, I believe, to every State where our militia have been paid.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I cannot accept that, and I think if the Senator from Ohio had listened to the dispatches which I read he would not be willing to exclude from this payment the troops who were in the service and did the duty which was required of them, although they happened not to be actually mustered into the service of the United States. That was the condition of our troops.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard those dispatches, but I think New Jersey ought to be punished a little for having a Governor who, if I am correctly informed, refused to allow the militia of New Jersey to be mustered into the service of the United States, if that is the case.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey by striking out the words "whether regularly mustered in or not."

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the first question comes up on perfecting the part to be stricken out. My amendment is to apply to the original bill, which I propose to perfect before the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator to move it as an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, I did move it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order to perfect the original bill before the question is taken on striking it out.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The Senator from Ohio said a moment ago that New Jersey ought to be punished because her Governor refused to allow the troops of the State to be actually mustered into the service of the United States. Well, sir, a man must go away from home to learn history and to learn the facts respecting his own State and his own people. I am under the impression that the Senator from Ohio is in error on that subject. But suppose he were correct; suppose it were true that the Executive of the State of New Jersey had refused to allow the troops of that State to be mustered into the service of the United States, but yet in pursuance of the urgent call of the Governor of Pennsylvania and the request of the Secretary of War and the Government here to send forward the troops from that State, after inquiry had been made whether they would be required to be mustered into the service of the United States or not, and the Governor of Pennsylvania had urgently appealed to him to send them on, although they might not have been, and the Secretary of War had stated that he desired they should come, notwithstanding they were not mustered into the service of the United States, and that they should receive the same pay and the same consideration as troops that were, should they not be paid? I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio paid any attention to the telegrams on that subject or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not hear the telegram from the Secretary of War read.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read them again. They are very short. Inquiry was made by the Executive of the State of New Jersey both of the Governor of Pennsylvania and the Secretary of War upon this subject, with respect to the length of time service was to be required of the troops they called for, and with respect to the fact whether they were to be actually mustered into the service of the United States. Now, see what Governor Curtin says in his telegram of the 20th of June, 1863, to Governor Parker:

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, June 20, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER:

Will it be possible for your troops to remain with us during the present emergency whatever its duration may be? If not, for what time will they be mustered into service? Our own militia are being mustered to serve during the present emergency; its termination to be fixed by my order; and the arrangement is approved by the War Department.

That was the way the troops of New Jersey were sent. They were to remain under the arrangement that had been made by the Governor of Pennsylvania with the Secretary of War, as long as he should approve:

I assure you I will not detain them longer than the necessity for their presence exists. A. G. CURTIN.

Here is a dispatch from Mr. S. M. Dickinson, who was an official acting for the Governor, to Governor Parker:

HARRISBURG, June 23, 1863.

Governor JOEL PARKER:

Have seen Governor Curtin. Enemy advancing in heavy force. He wishes to retain the services of the men now here as militia of New Jersey, and will subsidize them. Captain Murphy prefers not to go home under the circumstances, as also the men. Governor Curtin will answer your letter fully, and I will return with it at one p. m. to-morrow. Answer what I shall do with the order.

S. M. DICKINSON,
Buchert House.

Here is the next dispatch from Governor Curtin to Governor Parker:

HARRISBURG, June 23, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER:

I answer by your secretary. Meantime the enemy is advancing. He is now at Shippensburg in force, and I trust you will continue to raise troops. I send messenger to Washington to ask that your troops be received for limited time or for this emergency, and if possible without muster into the service of the United States.

A. G. CURTIN,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the reply of the Secretary of War to that?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will read it. Here is another dispatch from Governor Curtin to Governor Parker:

HARRISBURG, June 26, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

The enemy is in possession of the State from Carlisle to the Maryland line. He occupies the country in force. I trust you will not relax your efforts to help a sister State and kindred people.

A. G. CURTIN.

Now I ask the Senator to listen to this dispatch:

HARRISBURG, June 27, 1863.

His Excellency JOEL PARKER, Governor of New Jersey:

General Couch has been authorized to take into service in this department any troops whatever, mustered into United States service or not. The rebels are here in force, and we certainly need troops.

A. G. CURTIN.

Now comes the dispatch from the Secretary of War to Governor Parker, dated Washington, June 28, 1863, about a week before the battle of Gettysburg:

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

General Couch is authorized to receive any troops that may be offered to serve under his command, whether sworn into the United States service or not. Please send any militia or other force at your disposal.

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

This was under the terrible exigency of the tramp of Lee's armed legions, when the whole North were not affrighted but aroused, and saw the necessity of placing every man upon the Susquehanna to meet the enemy face to face and foot to foot; and yet my friend from Minnesota proposes now to strike out the provision which would authorize payment to be made to the State of New Jersey to the extent of about $50,000 to satisfy the outlay the State was at in sending those troops to perform the service that was asked of them during that exigency. That is the return which my friend from Minnesota makes for my votes cast uninterruptedly and uniformly in behalf of his suffering people who were attacked not many years since by savages. He has always had my support and my desire that his people might be remunerated, so far as it was possible, for the expense they had been put to and the property they had lost in consequence of those attacks.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether in that terrible exigency, for I think it was a most important crisis in the history of this country, the Governor of New Jersey refused, when Lee's army had invaded the State of Pennsylvania, to permit the militia of New Jersey to be mustered temporarily into the service of the United States? I want the Senator to answer that question.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I say in all frankness that if the Governor of New Jersey ever did that thing it is utterly unknown to me, and I think I ought to know something about it. But I answer furthermore, if the fact were so in its length and breadth and according to the broadest position in which the Senator puts it, should the treasury of the State, which was burdened to the extent of a few thousand dollars—and I wish the Senator to understand we can get along without it and can pay the expense and would have done it cheerfully and willingly—but should the treasury of the State be subject to this burden because the Governor of the State may have taken that position or did take it, if he did take it? Should the troops who went into Pennsylvania, some of whom were in the front and others placed in fortifications and performed guard duty while veterans were sent forward, be ignored and the services they rendered? Many of them left their homes at half a day's warning and remained away for weeks. Should they be turned adrift and come under the discrimination of the Senator from Minnesota because the Governor of the State may have taken that position, which I do not admit, and which I never heard of? I submit it now to the candor and sense of justice of the Senator, would he discriminate against the troops of New Jersey when he knows from the dispatches I have read that the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania appealed to them as a kindred people to come and aid his State in its distress, that they should be regarded as troops and be entitled to payment, and when the Secretary of War telegraphed to the Governor of New Jersey that they should be put upon that footing although they were not actually mustered into the service.

Would the Senator from Minnesota have these regiments that had been down in the front and had fought at Fredericksburg and had lost fully one third of their numbers and had just returned, their times having expired, and were waiting in camp to be paid off and mustered out of the service—would he have those troops turned adrift and refused payment because they were not willing then under these circumstances, if they were unwilling, to be mustered into the service of the United States and to be kept as long as the Governor of Pennsylvania or the Secretary of War might see fit to keep them, without limitation and restriction as to time? Why, sir, it would have been a gross act of injustice, and to take such a position now and exercise it with regard to those men, I submit, is treating war-worn veterans, who have the scars of battle upon them, with indignity and injustice.

Mr. WILKINSON. So far as the soldiers of the State of New Jersey are concerned, those who are in the Army and those who volunteered to go into the State of Pennsylvania, I think I would be as liberal toward them as anybody else. When this invasion of Pennsylvania by the rebel General Lee was going on, I was in Minnesota, nearly two thousand miles away from this place, and I then saw in the telegraphic dispatches in the newspapers that the Governor of New Jersey, after having sent forward some troops, refused—and this is what I wanted the Senator from New Jersey to answer me a little while ago—to allow this militia of the State of New Jersey, when their border State was invaded, to be mustered into the service of the United States. While it is hard to visit upon the brave soldiers of New Jersey the effect of the conduct of their chief Executive, I say to the Senator that that State, as long as they elect such a Governor, must abide by the consequences of his official act. It is unfortunate for that State, perhaps, and for those soldiers, that they elected such a Governor, but having elected him and he having refused to allow those men to be mustered into the service for more than one month to defend the State of Pennsylvania and perhaps the State of New Jersey, they ought not to be paid one dollar, in my humble judgment, not because any punishment should be visited upon the men, but the State of New Jersey should suffer the penalty of having elected a copperhead Governor.

Mr. SHERMAN. A sufficient reply to the Senator from Minnesota is this: that pending the emergency, the Secretary of War, by a telegraphic dispatch which has been read to us, expressly stipulated that this militia should be received as militia of the State of New Jersey without being mustered into the United States service. Perhaps his argument might do very well if there was no special agreement to the contrary; but the dispatch read by the Senator from New Jersey shows that before the battle of Gettysburg, before this militia left the State of New Jersey, the Secretary of War stipulated that, without being mustered into the service of the United States, they should be treated like other forces.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not understand that dispatch in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read again.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understood the dispatch to say that General Couch might command any troops that should be sent to him, whether mustered into the service of the United States or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only way to settle it is to have it read again. I had the same objection to this measure until that dispatch was read.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will read it again.

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1863.

His Excellency Governor PARKER:

General Couch is authorized to receive any troops that may be offered to serve under his command, whether sworn into the United States service or not. Please send any militia or other force at your disposal.

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. WILKINSON. I want this thing understood before I can vote for this proposition. I understood that the Governor of New Jersey, after sending those troops into Pennsylvania, absolutely refused to permit them to be sworn into the service of the United States for any length of time whatever. If he did that, I am opposed to paying those troops; let the State of New Jersey pay them. The Senator from New Jersey can answer that question.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I ought, in justice to the Executive of my State, to say a word in relation to this newspaper report which the Senator refers to as having read two thousand miles off, and upon the faith of which he is willing to refuse justice to the State of New Jersey, and to blacken the character of a man who, although he is a Democrat, is a true and loyal War Democrat.

Mr. WILKINSON. Will the Senator explain the charge to which I have referred?

Mr. TEN EYCK. Yes, sir. With regard to his refusal to send aid, perhaps I had better read one of these dispatches from Governor Curtin.

Mr. WILKINSON. I did not say he refused to send aid. I say he refused to allow those troops to be mustered into the service of the United States. I do not want the Senator to misrepresent me.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not think the Senator was in the Chamber when this discussion commenced and when I read these numerous dispatches. If any Senator feels interest enough in the question to take them up from beginning to end he will ascertain from the history detailed by them that no such conclusion can be drawn from these dispatches as the Senator from Minnesota has drawn unfavorable to the character of the Governor. I will again read one of these dispatches for the purpose of showing that the Governor of Pennsylvania did not regard the Governor of New Jersey as occupying so improper a position as the Senator from Minnesota seems to think, for as early as June 16, 1863, he says in a dispatch to Governor Parker:

"The people of this State are under obligations to you for your promptness and energy in organizing and forwarding men to this place. General Couch will have the best possible care taken of them."

I stated when I was up before—and so it appears in the first dispatch from Governor Curtin to Governor Parker—the appeal to Governor Parker was to send these veterans who had been in at least two bloody fights, on the heights of St. Mary and at Fredericksburg, who were then in the vicinity of Trenton, the center of the State, and one of them at Beverly, commanded by the gallant Colonel Grubb, to send them back to the front of battle instead of seeking their homes and families, as the small remaining portion who had returned in health and strength had hoped to do. The appeal was to send these men, used to war and fresh from the field of battle, back into Pennsylvania to meet Lee's legions, and to engage in that strife which was a play for empire. These men naturally would be indisposed to be sworn into the service of the United States without limitation as to time or description of place to which they were to go; and it would have been an act of peculiar hardship for the Governor to insist or appeal to them to do that. Perhaps they would have done it. That is an answer and a reason why he should endeavor to get those men accepted upon other terms, that they should go and serve as long as they were needed in the State of Pennsylvania to repel this invasion. That was the object of the call. He knew and we knew that the men who had proved their loyalty and bore the evidence of their devotion to the country upon their wounded bodies needed no oath to muster them into the service of the United States in order to secure their services in the place where they were wanted.

I think the deduction which the Senator from Minnesota has drawn from the action of the Executive of the State upon that occasion is unjust in view of all the circumstances. I suppose the Senator did not fully understand them, as he failed to understand or perhaps did not hear the full scope and effect of the telegram from the Secretary of War, which shows the character of the service they went to perform and the method in which they were mustered into the service.

I trust, sir, with a modification of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio that I shall propose that this bill may be allowed to pass. I will move to strike out the proviso at the end of the section, which will have the effect of authorizing the payment to be made to troops whether mustered into service or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order at the present time. The Senator from Ohio will indicate where he will have his amendment put in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have reduced it to writing. There are three several amendments that will have to be considered separately.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware till this bill was called up that such a bill was pending in Congress, and I must confess that the very title of the bill struck me with some surprise. It is a bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses incurred by that State in calling out the militia to repel an invasion, leaving the sister States who so promptly and patriotically came to her aid to take care of themselves as they might.

Mr. COWAN. This censure is wholly and entirely unjust, for under that title the honorable Senator will remember the House of Representatives passed an appropriation of $15,000,000 to cover all the States and everybody.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this is the shape in which the bill presents itself to the Senate for consideration. I do not blame the State of Pennsylvania for seeking reimbursement. Perhaps it is her right to do it. I do not deny that it is. Whether it was in good taste for her to do it just at this time is a different question. The State of New York, that sent a large number of militia to the aid and protection of Pennsylvania, has never asked, and if my counsels shall prevail, she never will ask, and while I am glad to accept the amendment of the Senator from Ohio which covers the expenses incurred by New York in case that State shall ask it, I am not in favor of having New York come to the General Government for reimbursement for the expenses incurred upon this extraordinary occasion. New York incurred some four or five hundred thousand dollars of expense in this sudden emergency in relieving her sister and neighbor State of Pennsylvania. If I could control it, I would have New York make that a present to the Government. For her patriotism and her courage I would ask no remuneration. But if Pennsylvania must come here to be remunerated for the expenses of calling out her militia to defend her own soil, I do not know why New Jersey and New York should not also participate in that remuneration. I, therefore, am quite willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which also proposes to remunerate those States; but I would prefer that no bill should be passed on the subject. Let Pennsylvania and New Jersey and New York for the present and in the present emergency of our Government bear these expenses, and by and by, when the proper time comes, when the General Government is more able to remunerate those States, let it be done. That would be my choice.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly the honorable Senator from New York does not understand the claim here. This is not a claim on the part of Pennsylvania. This is a claim on the part of private individuals and private corporations who came forward and advanced their money, and that money has been paid over to the troops, under an express agreement with the President and Secretary of War that they would recommend an appropriation of this kind. Nobody is proposing the reimbursement of New York and New Jersey that I know of. I cannot conceive that it is necessary when a Senator rises to defend some claim of his that he should assail other people. If the State of New York and the State of New Jersey did not succeed in having their claim attended to in the other House it was not because they were not well represented there. New York has more members in that House than any other State. New Jersey has several members. I cannot conceive why there is matter for reproach in the peculiar shape in which the bill comes here. I am sorry to be obliged to notice these things, particularly from my honorable friend from New York, who is usually so just, so temperate and mild in everything that he says and does.

I may say, too, that this was not done for the invasion of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania was not singled out as the object of Lee's invasion because she was Pennsylvania, but because she lay in his pathway to the great State of New York, because she lay in his way to New England States. Senators should thank their fortunes that Pennsylvania did lie in the way, that they might be protected from calamities of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, in line three after the word "to" to strike out the words "reimburse the institutions and individuals who advanced the money to pay the Pennsylvania soldiers who were called out by the proclamation of the President of the United States and the Governor of Pennsylvania," and to insert "pay the militia duly called out;" so that it will read:

That to pay the militia duly called out to repel the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, &c.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. President, I must say that there is no necessity for any division or difficulty between the honorable Senators from the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York on this subject. I think I understand this case. This bill proposes to reimburse certain private individuals and institutions who now ask to have returned to them money advanced by them in an emergency that not only tried the souls of the men of Pennsylvania but of New Jersey, New York, and Maryland. I trust that all these men will be paid. I think they should be. It was an emergency and an occasion on which, it seems to me, every man, every Union-loving man at least, should have had all his feelings aroused against an approaching foe.

But, sir, I do not see the necessity for clogging the bill proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania by amendments covering other claims. It is either an honest claim, a claim which should be paid, or it is not an honest claim. I believe it to be a fair claim presented for men called into service to meet an emergency in which certainly New Jersey and New York were equally interested with Pennsylvania. Why? Because Pennsylvania then formed the bulwark protecting them. The rebel troops had to pass through Pennsylvania before they could reach either New Jersey or New York. If the rebels had succeeded in passing through Pennsylvania and entering either or both of those States, as a matter of course they would have wanted the troops of Pennsylvania to follow on and aid them.

Under the circumstances, I think the best way would be for us to pass this bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and then at some subsequent time another bill can be presented providing for the payment of New York and New Jersey, either together or separately, as they choose. Sir, we may have occasion again to call troops suddenly together to repel an invading foe. I trust in God it may never be necessary again; but, sir, it may be, and if difficulties of this sort are thrown in the way of their payment, it will discourage men, and perhaps on another occasion they will not come forward so readily and unite with those who are engaged in the effort to drive back the invading foe.

As I before remarked, I cannot see that there is any necessity for a difficulty between the honorable Senators from those three States. I hope this bill will be passed and this claim paid, and I hope that New Jersey and New York will have their men paid. I care not what may have been the views of the Governor of New Jersey, these men came forward like men and rendered service, and therefore I think ought to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. SHERMAN was in line twelve to strike out the words "Governor of Pennsylvania" and to insert, "said militia, or where they have been paid then to the Governor of the State to which the said militia belongs in trust for the State or the institutions or individuals who advanced the money to pay the same;" so that the clause will read:

The sum of $700,000, of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated, to be paid to the said militia, or where they have been paid then to the Governor of the State, &c.

Mr. WILKINSON. I agree fully in every word that was uttered by the Senator from New York in regard to this appropriation. I do not wish to vote against an appropriation to pay the soldiers from any State who have fought or volunteered in a particular emergency to repel the invasion of any northern State. But I wish to say just one word in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania who spoke about his Pennsylvania nia militia standing in front of this army of Lee to prevent their marching up into New York and other northern States.

Mr. COWAN. It is inconceivable to me why Senators will persist in misrepresenting what has been said upon the floor here. I said nothing about the Pennsylvania militia standing in front of Lee. I said that the State of Pennsylvania lay between Lee and the States of New York and New Jersey and New England, and that that was why she was invaded—not because she was specially the State of Pennsylvania, but because it was necessary to invade her in order to get at the rest. I said nothing about the militia of the State of Pennsylvania, what they did or what they did not do.

Mr. WILKINSON. All I have got to say is that Minnesota lost pretty nearly a hundred men at Gettysburg, and I doubt whether there were one hundred of the militia of the whole State of Pennsylvania killed during that invasion. I very much doubt whether one hundred of the Pennsylvania militia were killed, but pretty nearly one hundred Minnesotians lie in the graveyard in the national cemetery at Gettysburg.

Mr. COWAN. I certainly should be the last man in the world to detract from the bravery of the soldiers of Minnesota. I believe they are as good soldiers as there are in the world; but I do not believe they are any better than those of other States, although the honorable Senator takes every possible opportunity to tell us something about what the brave soldiers of Minnesota have done. Mr. President, our soldiers are all Americans; they do not belong to this State or that State or the other State; and the man who attempts to make capital or to make himself fame by drawing these lines of distinction and by calling them by these sectional names is not helping to strengthen the Union or the great American cause. Let us avoid it.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senator will do me the justice to say that I alluded particularly to the militia, not to the regular soldiers from Pennsylvania. The regular soldiers from Pennsylvania I admit were in that fight. I merely alluded to the militia which are referred to in this bill. I think the seventh regiment from New York was sent down to Pennsylvania. I believe other regiments that were not mustered into the service of the United States were also down there. I do not know whether they were in the fight or not; but they were ready, as well as the militia of Pennsylvania, to go into the fight if it was necessary. I do not allude to the regular soldiers from the State of Pennsylvania, for they have been just as brave as any soldiers in the United States.

Mr. COWAN. I think that any allusion whatever to the soldiers of any particular State by name, particularly by way of sinister disparagement to other soldiers, is unfortunate, improper, not calculated to do any good, but calculated to provoke on the other hand the same kind of improper eulogy and detraction. I think we should sedulously avoid it. I have observed that line of conduct for myself. I never eulogize the soldiers of Pennsylvania, for fear it might be thought that by singling them out for my eulogy I reflected upon those of some other States, and I know of no reason for doing it. If I were asked to-day what State I believed produced the best soldiers of the Union I could not say. I could neither say it upon my honor nor my oath. I think they have all behaved very well, not only from the loyal States but from the disloyal. So far as soldiering is concerned, a man might be proud of his connection with either of them as an American.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. SHERMAN was to add the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That only so much shall be allowed and paid to such militia as would have been allowed and paid to other military forces in the service of the United States of the same grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The adoption of the amendments of the Senator from Ohio, as I understand it, renders it necessary to move to strike out the proviso at the end of the first section, and I move to strike out that proviso, which is in these words:

Provided, That the expenses of none of the militia of any State shall be paid under this act who refused to be mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope that amendment will not be stricken out. If in such an emergency as that soldiers refuse to be mustered into the service, I am unwilling and I will not vote to pay them.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not know how that question could fairly come up. There were some of them who were not mustered into the service of the United States under the express provision and stipulation of the Secretary of War. It may be said that they refused to be sworn in, and yet it may never have been offered to them to refuse or not. I do not know whether it will apply to any of the troops from the State of New York or not; I do not know whether they were mustered in or not; but I know that some from my State were not actually mustered into the service of the United States. They were that class of troops to whom I have referred, who came back from their long service in the field and went to the assistance of Pennsylvania in the exigency of the case under the urgent request of the Governors of the two States and the Secretary of War, without ever going home to their families. They did all the service required of them, although they were not actually mustered into the service of the United States as United States soldiers. They were militia-men of the United States, and are entitled to just as much pay, and having received the pay, the State is entitled to receive remuneration just as much as if they were sworn into the service. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WILKINSON. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey that he certainly has not considered. I wish to have it considered. I should like to know from the Senator from New Jersey how the United States can tell what militia to pay if they were not mustered into their service. Have we got to go to the rolls of New Jersey to ascertain who actually served? I ask the Senator how can he solve that difficulty? How can we tell who have served in the service of the United States unless we have the mustering-in rolls of the Department regular in form?

Mr. TEN EYCK. Can there be any difficulty about that? How were the accounts of the militia-men of the State of Pennsylvania made out? By the muster-rolls brought down here. Every man who was mustered in in the State of New York or in the State of New Jersey was mustered into a regular company, and took an oath to obey his officers and to perform service and duty as a soldier for that exigency. There is a record of them in the Adjutant General's office of each of these States. These accounts will have to be adjusted of course by the Government, and they can learn them just as well from the muster-rolls in those States as they could from the muster-rolls of the United States. Sir, I think this is rather a sharp point to take. How is it to be discovered what men served? It was discovered when they were called upon to go to the relief of the country generally that they were on the ground, and every man of them was reported to the Executive of the State of Pennsylvania, and, for aught I know, to the Government here; but whether they were or not I take it for granted the Government here will make provision to ascertain that fact, for the Government here appealed to the Executive of the State of New Jersey to send troops, stating that they should receive the same pay and rations as if they were sworn and mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel bound to vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey for this reason: the Secretary of War by telegram expressly accepted all the militia of the State of New Jersey, and waived their mustering into the service of the United States; but I hope it will never be done again. It was done under the emergency, and an emergency put upon the Government by the Governor of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Pardon me—

Mr. SHERMAN. It must have been so. The rule was applied to New York. The regiments of militia from the State of New York were mustered into the service of the United States, as I understand; and the same is true of the militia of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the Senator pardon me for one moment? We had no regular militia system perfected in New Jersey as they have in the State of Ohio. The invasion of Pennsylvania by the rebel army under General Lee occurred just about the time that a number of our regiments that had been in the service of the United States were about being disbanded. They had returned home, but were still in camp waiting to be mustered out. The whole effort was to get those men to retrace their steps, and go into the service again during that emergency. It would have been a severe thing to insist upon it that those men should be sworn in for any length of time. The great object was to obtain the services of those men. One of those men would be equal to at least three green men called into the field upon an emergency like that. That is the reason why there was a difficulty. These men were willing to go; they were willing to serve; they were willing to help to repel this invasion; but the probability is they were unwilling as a body to go off immediately and be mustered into the service without limitation as to time. I have given the Senate the reason why it was, and it seems to me rational, and I think we can understand it. Although we may hope it may never take place again, I hope we may never have an occasion like it again.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. HARLAN. Before that motion is put I should like to call up a resolution that I know will not be objected to by any member of the body. It is Senate joint resolution No. 74.

Mr. SUMNER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. COWAN. I will not object unless it displaces the order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not in the opinion of the Chair.

DAY OF NATIONAL HUMILIATION.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 74) requesting the President to appoint a day for national humiliation and prayer. The resolution is as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to appoint a day for humiliation and prayer by the people of the United States; that he request his constitutional advisers at the head of the Executive Departments to unite with him as the Chief Magistrate of the nation, at the city of Washington, and the members of Congress, and all magistrates, all civil, military, and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors, and marines, with all loyal and law-abiding people, to convene at their usual places of worship, or wherever they may be, to confess and to repent of their manifold sins; to implore the compassion and forgiveness of the Almighty, that, if consistent with His will, the existing rebellion may be speedily suppressed, and the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States may be established throughout all the States; to implore Him, as the Supreme Ruler of the world, not to destroy us as a people, nor suffer us to be destroyed by the hostility or connivance of other nations, or by obstinate adhesion to our own counsels, which may be in conflict with His eternal purposes, and to implore Him to enlighten the mind of the nation to know and do His will; humbly believing that it is in accordance with His will that our place should be maintained as a united people among the family of nations; to implore Him to grant to our armed defenders and the masses of the people that courage, power of resistance, and endurance necessary to secure that result; to implore Him in His infinite goodness to soften the hearts, enlighten the minds, and quicken the consciences of those in rebellion, that they may lay down their arms and speedily return to their allegiance to the United States, that they may not be utterly destroyed, that the effusion of blood may be stayed, and that unity and fraternity may be restored, and peace established throughout all our borders.

Mr. HALE. Does that resolution come from any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed not. It was offered on leave by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HALE. I hate to differ from a gentleman for whom I have so much respect as I have for the Senator from Iowa; but I confess that to my perception it is not a resolution which the Senate ought to pass. There are many reasons for it to my mind. I shall not state them all, because some of them might possibly be offensive to the Senator from Iowa, for whom I have the highest respect and the kindest feeling.

I believe in the efficacy of prayer, I think, as much as the Senator from Iowa; but in my opinion there is very little of it that is aided or benefited by legislative enactments, and I believe that the less display of it that is made the better. I think that one of the worst things in the inaugural address of General Pierce was the allusion to the peculiar affliction with which Providence had visited him. I believe we have all of us need enough for prayer and need enough for divine blessing; but I confess I do not think that those things are best expressed in legislative enactments or resolves. This is a matter that rests in the discretion of the President, and whenever he sees fit to issue his proclamation I trust the good people of the Union will give as much attention to it as it deserves.

There is another view of the case that to my mind is a reason why such a resolution as this should not be adopted. We are in the midst of one of the most critical campaigns that has occurred since the commencement of this rebellion; we are in the midst of a campaign which many people suppose and believe is to be decisive of the conflict in which we are to be engaged; and such an expression as this taken at this time might indicate to the nations of the world, and to those with whom we are contending, that our fortunes are desperate; that we felt at this time as if all human resources were about failing us, and we had nothing to do but to throw ourselves, where of course we must always throw ourselves, upon the mercy and the goodness of God. I think we can as appropriately pray, and worship with as much effect, without any legislative or executive action as with; and the last reason which I have named is conclusive in my mind against the propriety of the resolution at this time. I hope, therefore, that it will not be adopted.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Senator who has just taken his seat if he takes exception to the phraseology or purview of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. I did not notice anything offensive in it in that particular, though I must confess I did think that, for a suggestion, it was rather minute and directory in regard to the subject-matter that was to be prayed for. There are a great many very enlightened Christians in this world who do not believe that it is consistent with rational piety to pray specifically for the divine aid in any particular transaction or event, but that a more enlightened piety prays for such a course of events as the wisdom and goodness of God may deem best for us and for the nation, without pointing out directly the mode and manner by which these blessings are to be conveyed, and the way in which they are to be vouchsafed to us. But I take no exception to the language of the resolution. The resolution itself does not meet my idea of the needs of the country at this time.

Mr. HARLAN. The reason why I asked the question was, that if the objection was to the phraseology or scope of the resolution I then would have moved to refer it to a committee for the purpose of amending it; but if that is not the foundation of the objection I content myself by a vote taken on the resolution at this time.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not like the tone, the temper, or the spirit of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. It is my firm conviction that the more humbly we bow ourselves before that Almighty Power that controls the universe the stronger we are; and that when any proposition of that kind is made it does not and cannot deserve rebuke.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO SENATORS.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I move that my colleague, Hon. JACOB COLLAMER, have leave of absence from the Senate for the residue of the session, including this day. I make the motion in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of July 17, 1862, the section of which upon this point I will read, and ask the attention of Senators to it for their own benefit:

"SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That when any Senator or Representative shall hereafter withdraw from his seat in anticipation of the adjournment of Congress and before the adjournment, and does not return, he shall, in addition to the sum now deducted for each day, forfeit a further sum equal to the mileage now allowed by law for his return home, and it shall be deducted from his compensation unless where said withdrawal is with the leave of the Senate or House of Representatives respectively."

My colleague has left the city for his home without the expectation or purpose of returning to the city or to the Senate again during the residue of this session, and in consequence, as is well known to all Senators, of his somewhat severe and protracted indisposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall leave of absence be granted to the Senator from Vermont?"

Leave was granted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. At the request of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] who informs me that there is a necessity for his leaving the city to-morrow, I move that leave of absence for the residue of the session be extended to him.

Leave was granted.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 559) to quiet the titles to lands within the Rancho Laguna de Santos Calle, in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments; and as it is necessary to consider the bill this evening I propose that we now take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. COWAN. Let me get through with my bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for a recess has already been made. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] that the Senate now take a recess until seven o'clock.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays in order to get a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wiley, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Hendricks, Powell, and Van Winkle—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Saisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—24.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate accordingly took a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a little bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the law of evidence in the District of Columbia, being Senate bill No. 271.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 271) relating to civil actions in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. As the Committee on the Judiciary have reported a substitute for the bill, I ask that the substitute only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert:

That on the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any suit, action, or other proceeding in any court of justice in the District of Columbia, or before any person having by law, or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence within said District, the parties thereto, and the persons in whose behalf any such action or other proceeding may be brought or defended, and any and all persons interested in the same, shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either in vivo or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on behalf of either or any of the parties to the said action or other proceeding: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall render any person who is charged with any offense in any criminal proceeding competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself or herself, or shall render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself or herself, or shall in any criminal proceeding render any husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, or any wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery; nor shall any husband be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, nor shall any wife be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill relating to the law of evidence in the District of Columbia."

SUPPRESSION OF CINCINNATI ENQUIRER.

Mr. POWELL. I move to take up the resolution I offered some days since in regard to prohibiting the circulation of the Cincinnati Enquirer in the State of Kentucky.

The Secretary read the resolution proposed to be taken up, as follows:

Whereas a military order has been recently issued in the State of Kentucky prohibiting the circulation in said State of the Cincinnati Enquirer, a newspaper printed and published at Cincinnati, Ohio; and whereas a free press is essential to maintain the rights and liberties of the people: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the aforesaid military order to be revoked; and that the President be further requested to issue such orders as will prevent the military authorities from encroaching upon the freedom of the press in the future.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to its consideration.

Mr. POWELL. I move that all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to its consideration, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. No man here, I suppose, knows the circumstances under which this paper was suspended. It may have been preaching treason and sending its circulation all through the Army of the United States in Kentucky. It may have been the imperative duty of the officer to issue the order which he did issue, if it has been issued at all. The Senator should certainly furnish us some evidence, first, that the order has been made, and second, that it has been improperly made, before calling on us by solemn resolution of the Senate to pronounce that act invalid and improper, and call upon the President to revoke an order of a military commander in the field.

Mr. POWELL. I will state that the Cincinnati Enquirer is a Democratic paper published in that city, the character of which I suppose is well known to every Senator in this Chamber. The military authorities in Kentucky issued an order preventing the circulation of that paper in that State. It is more largely taken by the people of Kentucky, the Democratic people at least, than any other paper outside of the State. I have seen and read the order. It simply prohibits its circulation in the State. It does not allege any reason for it. I am a daily reader of that paper. I get it every day. It is a leading political journal of the Democratic party in the State of Ohio. We have recently, during the last year, been very badly treated in the matter of our elections in the State of Kentucky, and now, thus early in the campaign, the circulation of that paper, which is opposed to the policy of the President, is stopped in that State. The resolution simply requests the President to require that order to be revoked, and to issue orders to protect the freedom of the press in the future.

I will state to the Senate that the order simply says that the paper shall not be circulated in that department. That is all there is of it. It does not assign any reason for the order. It looks to me as if it was an effort in advance to reenact what was enacted last year in that State by striking down freedom of the press and freedom of the ballot; and I want to resist it at the threshold. The resolution condemns nothing; it simply requests the President—it is in the mildest form, perhaps, in which it could be presented—to revoke an order to prevent a paper issued in a neighboring State being circulated in the State of Kentucky. It strikes me that all who are for a free press and free political action in this country will vote for the resolution. It censures nobody. It merely states the fact that such an order has been issued, and then asks the Commander-in-Chief to direct his subordinate to revoke it, and not issue such orders in the future.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will withhold his report until this question is disposed of.

Mr. POWELL. I yield.

Mr. McDUGALL. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred House bill No. 553, have had that matter under consideration, and have made no amendment to it, and directed me to report it back and ask for its present consideration. It is a small matter relating to a land claim in California.

Mr. COWAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it cannot be considered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COWAN. I am going to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. I do not know anything about the Cincinnati Enquirer. I do not know, to the best of my knowledge, that I have ever read a copy of that paper; I do not know what it says nor what it advocates, and I do not care; but I have come to the conclusion for the future to endeavor to do all I can to prevent the exercise of that arbitrary power which, in my judgment, is doing more mischief to the cause of the Union to-day than almost all other things put together. Why, Mr. President, is it possible that anything can be more absurd, under the theory of our Government, than that anybody should undertake to suppress a newspaper, particularly in loyal States? This, sir, is a Government of the people. In the people the sovereignty is presumed to be lodged. The fabric is built upon their presumed intelligence, their presumed good sense in understanding what will be good for themselves, and they are also presumed to be equal in every respect to their rulers.

Now, sir, although I am not a Democrat in name, I am so far a Democrat and so far a Republican that I trust the people. I trust the people because they are sovereign; I trust the people to say what they will, to read what they will; not to do what they will, but to say what they will, and to read what they will. If we cannot trust the people, if it has come to this, that a man clothed in a little brief authority arrogates to himself the intelligence, the good sense, and the sovereignty of the people, and undertakes to direct what the people shall say, and what the people shall read, and what the people shall think, then I say there is not only an end of the Union but there is an end of a democratic, republican form of government, and you cannot disguise it. You may sit quiet; you may try to doctor it, and to cobble it, and to hold it forth to the world as a free Government, but it is a skeleton; it will fall about your ears, and you will find yourselves swept away by a despotism and a tyranny which it will be too late, perhaps, to resist when resistance in the opinion of all good men will become necessary.

Why, Mr. President, what do these papers say? Is there a Senator present who can satisfy himself, much less anybody else, that these papers that talk what is called treason, criticising the Administration, croaking, misrepresenting, if you please, have converted anybody? The truth is they do more harm to the cause they advocate than they do to the cause they oppose. But suppress them, suppress free speech and free thought and free criticism and free examination, and what then? Then the power that does it weakens itself; then the power that does it is recreant to the trust confided to it; and that is the thing which will make it enemies and finally overthrow it.

I know, sir, that in a time like this, when the minds of men are agitated and disturbed, and when people are apprehensive, they are apt to resort to expedients of this kind in the hope that out of them, in some way or other, they may secure their safety; but if there is one lesson which the world has taught, which has come from a past experience, more impressive than any other, it is that these expedients are not only fallacious, not only useless, but mischievous and subversive of the very end they were adopted to attain.

I therefore hope that the Senate will express to the President and to his officers that it disapproves of this kind of proceeding. I trust the Senate will say to the President and his officers that it is the representative of the American people, not its master, and that we choose to trust the people we represent; that we will rely upon their prudence, upon their loyalty, upon their good sense to listen to any kind of speaking and to read any kind of reading without having their faith shaken or their loyalty destroyed. I think that is the manly way to treat this matter; and I think I may say in all safety that there has hardly been a case where the exercise of this power has not been mischievous to our cause. What better weapon among a free people could you put in the hands of the Opposition than acts of this kind? I cannot conceive of any. Certainly, gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, some of whom have been a long time in opposition, would have been exceedingly glad if the power they resisted had furnished them with capital to trade upon like this. I therefore trust we will meet this thing as men, as men worthy of the position we occupy, worthy of those whom we succeed, and relying upon the people and trusting the people with this which it is their peculiar prerogative under our institutions to enjoy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take occasion to state that at this period of the session the Chair will hold the rule pretty strictly. It is not in order to debate the general merits of a question on a motion to take it up, because the time of the Senate would be consumed in that way. The motion is to take up the resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think the ruling of the Chair is perfectly correct; but it does seem to me that after two speeches in favor of the resolution a simple statement of the circumstances under which this order was issued should be tolerated by the Senate and by the Chair.

Some two weeks ago, I think, I saw a telegraphic dispatch that General Burbridge, of Kentucky, had suppressed the circulation of the Cincinnati Enquirer in the State of Kentucky. I have never seen the official order, but I doubt not it was issued, and I doubt not it was issued upon sufficient and good authority. General Burbridge is a native Kentuckian, a gallant Kentuckian, commanding that department, and commanding it with distinguished ability, fidelity, patriotism, and success. When this order was issued Kentucky was being invaded by John Morgan and his forces, and he supposed that the circulation of this paper in his department gave aid and comfort to the enemy; and I have no doubt of it, although I did not see the particular number to which exception was taken; but from the general tone of the paper I have no doubt it was calculated to give aid and comfort to the enemy and to do more to overturn and deluge in blood that noble Commonwealth than all the soldiers of John Morgan. I have no doubt he had abundant cause to issue this order.

Now, had he the authority to issue it? Will any gentleman contend, will the Senator from Pennsylvania contend, that a man shall go into the Union armies and make speeches calculated to excite insurrection and insubordination in the Army of the United States without being liable to be arrested by the commander of the Army or the commander of the department? Will any Senator contend that such a speech could be tolerated in the presence of the Army and in the face of our troops without the man being guilty of inciting mutiny and insurrection? If a man cannot do it in person in the presence of the Army, has he a right to make that speech in Cincinnati and fulminate it throughout the Army, having precisely the same effect?

I think myself that neither proposition contemplated in this resolution should pass. The first is, that the President shall be requested to revoke an order made by the commander of the department of Kentucky. That order was suppressing a newspaper which he believed was giving daily aid and comfort to the enemy. He is there to protect the people of Kentucky, to uphold the Government and the supremacy of the laws. This is one of the means, in his opinion, of accomplishing precisely that object. He is clothed, as the commander of that department, with discretionary power. He chooses his means. He orders a regiment here and a battery there; he orders a spy to be hung; and if incendiary documents are published in his camp he is recreant to his duty and unworthy of his command if he does not instantly suppress it; wholly unworthy of the public confidence if he should fail in his duty in this particular. I think that the power is complete and ample and the discretion is properly lodged in the commander of the department.

The other proposition of the resolution is that the President shall be requested in the future to prevent all such orders interfering with the free circulation of papers in our Army. Suppose, if you please, an emissary of Jeff. Davis, a spy, should go into General Burbridge's camp and print an open secession paper, publishing treason every day. If you pass this resolution you have no power to touch him. The President would have at least our opinion upon it that we had no power to touch him. He might go into the very camp of your Army and publish a secession paper if you pass this resolution, and the President has it, as our opinion, that the freedom of the press protects him!

What is the freedom of the press? To give aid and comfort to the enemy? No, sir. The freedom of the press is like the freedom of an individual: it is liberty regulated by law; and where-soever the military law comes in conflict with this freedom of the press it must succumb. There is an order issued to suppress the Cincinnati Enquirer; and without knowing precisely what the article was or what the order is, Congress are required to volunteer their advice to the Commander-in-Chief of your Army, and ask him to revoke that order in the dark, without knowing why or wherefore it was issued, and to ask him in future to say that no such order shall be issued. I am not prepared to vote either that he shall revoke this order or that in future he shall make no such order.

But I have no doubt the order was issued upon good and sufficient grounds; and hereafter, where-soever a traitorous editor shall fulminate his treason in the face of your soldiers, I say it is the duty of the commander-in-chief and the President to suppress it, and they are unworthy of their position if they do not suppress it. We may as well give up the Government if you are to offer a premium upon treason and a license to traitors and invite them into your Army to publish what-soever they please. This is no time to tamper with any subject like this. The people are interested in this matter and the whole people; and I strike in defense of the Constitution, for without the Government the Constitution is nothing. We have dealt too leniently with traitors; we have dealt too leniently with this treasonable press; and no other Government upon earth contending for existence would have suffered as long as we have such utterances to be made to our Army.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have a single word to say in reply. I am exceedingly sorry that my honorable friend has not taken a correct view of this question. What kind of a compliment does he pay to our Army? What is the purport of his speech here in the Senate of the United States as regards an American soldier, one holding in his hands a part of the sovereignty of the nation, one in possession of political power, one who under the flag of his country is ready to peril his life every day in order to save and preserve it? What does my honorable friend say to him? "You are not fit to read this paper; you ought not to read it; it will poison you; it will destroy the soundness of your principles; it will sap your loyalty; it will endanger the fidelity that you owe to your Government." Why, Mr. President, if I was a soldier in the American Army I would say to the honorable Senator, "Senator as you are, who made you my master; who made you a judge as to what I shall read and what I shall not read? Have you any more stake in the country than I have? Is there any presumption of law that you are a better judge of the matter which my brain is to digest?"

Mr. GRIMES. But the military commander has that power by military law.

Mr. COWAN. I will come to that in one moment. I am putting the very strongest possible case. I say that the soldier, under the theory of our Government—mark that—has a right to say, "I am competent to read and think for myself, particularly in all matters that pertain to governmental policy, inasmuch as I myself am intrusted by the American people with a portion of its sovereignty, and I am here defending it." If this were an army in the Old World, where the soldier was not the recipient of political power, where he was not trusted with any portion of the sovereignty, where he was a subject, where he was not allowed to think and to act on behalf of the community, where he is to be turned, in order to make him a good soldier, into a machine, in the language of military men, then I have no doubt the Senator would be right, because he proceeds upon the assumption that these men are not to be safely intrusted with this kind of information. That is the basis of it. In monarchical Governments the same theory is held. But what I said at the outset was that all that is inconsistent with our theory of government. I said I put the case where the paper goes into the camp of the commander, and I say that upon principle in this country particularly by those who contend for the principles of liberty, free speech and free thought and free action, it cannot be justified in that case; but I do not propose to go so far.

As I understand, nobody complains where a military commander keeps out of his camp seditious papers, mischievous papers if you please, papers which are not in the interest of the Administration. Nobody complains of that; at least I do not. If General Burbridge, or whatever his name may be, excluded the Cincinnati Enquirer from his camps, I have no objection. But that is not the complaint. General Burbridge has gone further; he has not only undertaken to decide what the soldier shall and what the soldier shall not read, but he casts the mantle of his military authority over the whole of his district. He has said to the people of his district, those who are not in the service, those who are not bound by the military rules and regulations necessary to the discipline of the camp, "You shall not read the Cincinnati Enquirer."

Mr. President, I cannot conceive of any proposition which to me is so much at war with the fundamental principles for which we have been struggling for three quarters of a century. The very principle on which the Revolution rested, the very principle on which this Republic based itself, and the principle that we have proclaimed to all the world, said to them, "You have been mistaken; you thought that the press would have to be restrained, that it ought not to publish this, that, and the other; you thought that the people could not listen to all kinds of speeches. You are mistaken; they can; they have as much sense as any of you; we trust them in the United States of America, and trusting them, see how we have prospered."

Mr. President, this is all timid feeling on the part of our rulers. We are far safer if we trust the people than if we attempt to restrain them. We are far safer when we rely on their loyalty, on their good sense, and upon their understanding themselves of what is their best interests than if we undertake by these means to say to them, "You shall not enjoy the rights which your ancestors bequeathed to you and which they won for you at such a cost just because we decide that we will trample them under foot." Why should not this be? Are we afraid of the people? Are we afraid of the people of Kentucky? If we are afraid of the people of Kentucky, do you suppose you can make them loyal by closing up the avenues of communication between them and Cincinnati? Do you suppose you can purge a man's brain of treasonable thoughts, treasonable sentiments, and treasonable intentions by saying he shall not read a favorite newspaper? If I wished to aggravate his tendencies to treason, if I wished to make a rebel of a disaffected man, I would treat him exactly according to that diet and regimen; but if I desired to make him loyal I would throw myself on his good sense, on his knowledge of what was his own interest and the interest of the community, and if that did not succeed, if that is not the true theory, then, as I said before, our Government and our system is all a delusion and a snare.

I have no fears about this thing. I live in a district of country where newspapers are published—well, I should say according to the modern slang phrase, of the bitterest copperhead caste. I have never found that they produced the slightest effect whatever upon the people; but I am very sure that if to-day one of those papers were suppressed a very serious effect would be produced, and hundreds and thousands of men would resent it as an insult to them who now laugh at these things and treat them as the idle and passing wind. Does not this arise out of an apprehension, a timid political apprehension of trouble and difficulty as the result of it rather than treason? Will not the world put that construction upon our conduct if we sanction these things? Will they not say you are afraid that these people will become politically the opponents of the Administration rather than that they shall become enemies of the Government and desiring its overthrow? I should be fearful of it, and as a matter of policy, apart from the principle involved in the thing, I would deprecate very much that our rulers should ever so far forget the source of their power and whence it springs as to resort to expedients of this nature.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, this is a very fine subject for declamation; and as I have been exceedingly engaged in dry business for a considerable number of days and weeks I have had no opportunity to participate in the exciting debates of the Senate. I should like very much to improve the occasion to make a speech upon it myself; but I am warned not to do so by the fact that I am inquired of about forty times a day by gentlemen, some of whom are in the habit of making speeches here pretty often, when we can adjourn, regretting that we are compelled to sit here when we ought to be away, especially at this period of the year. Under these circumstances, and believing that we ought to be approaching very nearly the end of the session, and knowing that we have important business yet to be transacted, especially a bill upon the table which has come from the other House in relation to conscription, enlistments, &c., with a view to fill up the ranks of the Army, and being very anxious that that bill shall be taken up, I will forbear and restrain the strong impulse that is upon me to speak on this occasion and move that the subject be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion to lay on the table is not in order. There is nothing to lay on the table. It is a mere motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there is no way to stop debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The way to stop debate is for the Chair to restrict debate to the motion to take up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Chair will do so for the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will do so if sustained by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I give notice that I shall call any gentleman to order who wanders beyond the proper limit of debate.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate. Indeed, I did not suppose I should say one word on this motion. I thought the subject was one which would meet the approval of every Senator here. My friend from Indiana, however, speaks of the Cincinnati Enquirer as a treasonable paper. Why, sir, I have read that paper for the last four or five years—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not allow the Senator to wander from the question of taking up.

Mr. POWELL. Will the Chair allow me to set the Senator from Indiana right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not allow the debate to wander.

Mr. POWELL. It will only take one moment to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not allow the Senator a moment.

Mr. POWELL. I regret that I am the only one who is put under that rigid rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the expression of the Senate the Chair feels bound to enforce the rule.

Mr. POWELL. I do not know that the Senate has made any such expression. If the Senator from Maine is the Senate the Senate have made an expression.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the Senator to order, and he may take an appeal, and the matter will be decided.

Mr. POWELL. I do not care to take an appeal. I should have got through by this time all I had to say if I had not been interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair only desires to expedite the business of the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator made another statement that this order was issued by General Burbridge. I saw it stated in the Cincinnati Enquirer to-day that it was issued by a General Ewing, whom I do not know. The order when issued was signed by authority of a lieutenant colonel by the name of Farley.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again call the Senator to order. It is unpleasant to the Chair to have a controversy, but the Chair must enforce the rule of the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. I regret that I am the only Senator who is put under this rule; and while I have great confidence in and consideration for the Senator from Maine, I regret that he is the Senate. If I am not to be allowed to correct the misstatements or misapprehensions relative to this resolution, I will take my seat and simply say to the Senate that the object of this resolution is to give to this country freedom of the press. We are about entering upon a political canvass, and the military authorities, under the command of the President, who is a candidate for reelection to that high office, have chosen to strike down and prevent the circulation in one of the sovereign States of this Union of a Democratic paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will come to order, and will take his seat, and will not proceed without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. I will take my seat.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And I desire to speak upon that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The point of order is that the Senator from Kentucky is urging upon the Senate reasons why this body should immediately consider the resolution which he has introduced, and upon that question I desire to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Kentucky was called to order, from which action of the Chair I appeal, he was discussing the present condition of the country, and the approaching political contest, and the importance of freedom of debate, and of freedom of the press under our institutions during a great political contest. These are considerations addressed to the judgment of the Senate why the Senate should express its opinion against, in times like these, an act of the Government in suppressing the freedom of the press. I think that the argument pursued by the Senator from Kentucky is legitimate upon the question whether the Senate ought to take this resolution up. That is the question that is before the Senate. Shall the Senate take the resolution from the table and consider it now? The resolution of the Senator which he proposes to take up is to this effect: that the freedom of the press ought not to be interfered with by military officers; and he urges to the consideration of the Senate for its immediate action, that now above all times we ought to have a free press in this country; and in that judgment I concur with the Senator from Kentucky.

I am in favor of restricting ourselves properly in debate, and I would not wantonly appeal from the decision of the Chair unless I thought it too strictly restricted the freedom of debate. No Senator, I think, will say that I have departed from the questions that were before the body when I have addressed it. I did not appeal when the Chair first decided that the Senator from Kentucky was out of order. I then thought that he was pursuing a line of argument in answer to my colleague which perhaps was not addressed to the question before the body; but now when the Senator was called to order he was discussing the importance of an immediate expression of the opinion of the Senate against conduct on the part of officials which restricted if it did not strike down the freedom of the press. Is that not proper for the consideration of the Senate in deciding the question whether the resolution shall be taken up? I have the greatest respect for the Chair, as the Chair personally knows, for him personally, and for him in his official capacity; but I thought that the argument of the Senator from Kentucky on this very question that is before the body was legitimate and within the proper range of debate.

Mr. WILSON. Is it in order to move to postpone the consideration of the present and all prior questions to take up a bill? I desire to take up the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order to postpone the appeal and all prior orders.

Mr. WILSON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Massachusetts that the motion before the Senate be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Chair whether the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not a debatable question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, within limits.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I ask him to withdraw it that I may move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Ohio and others, with a view of an immediate vote on the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, I withdraw the appeal. He informs them that he does not care about forcing the debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. I desire that the question be put. The appeal is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that if the appeal can be withdrawn and is withdrawn, the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts would not be in order, because it would be piling one motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill upon another. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky must first be determined.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not in order for me to move that the consideration of the subject pending be postponed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is nothing but a motion to proceed to some other business.

Mr. WILSON. The motion I want to make is to postpone the consideration of the pending question which is moved by the Senator from Kentucky and all other questions, to take up the House bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and is of opinion that the only way to be rid of the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is to vote on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one other way, I think. I think the Senate can always command its own time. I move to lay the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already decided that to be out of order. It is done in the House of Representatives by rule. The Senate has no such rule. There is nothing to lay on the table.

Mr. POWELL. I only desire to say that I think it is very clear that I am not to have freedom of debate here. I am willing that a vote shall be taken upon the resolution without another word, and at some other time I will discuss the matter.

Several SENATORS. Take a vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, and Riddle—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Richardson, Sanbury, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—16.

So the motion to take up the resolution was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 109) to expedite the settlement of titles to land in the State of California.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following House bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 517) to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington; and

A bill (No. 560) to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Socol Ranch in the State of California."

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes; and had also agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 54) to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 527) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865; that it had agreed to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate to the bill, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that it insisted upon its disagreement and amendment as aforesaid, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, Mr. GEORGE S. BOWEN, and Mr. W. P. NOBLE, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 226) to aid in the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives upon a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite valley and of the land embracing the Mariposa Big Tree Grove;

A bill (H. R. No. 414) for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall; and

A bill (H. R. No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress, approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Los Ormigas and the La Nana grants in Louisiana.

AMENDMENT OF CONSCRIPTION LAW.

Mr. WILSON. I now renew my motion to take up House bill No. 549, further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a very bad bill, and I do not agree to take it up. There is nothing good in it. I move to take up House bill No. 307.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to rule that such a motion is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to lay the Senator's motion on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must rule that to be out of order. A mere motion cannot be laid on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. How can I get up the Camden and Amboy railroad bill?

Mr. WILSON. By voting me down. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senate will vote him down.

The motion of Mr. Wilson was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the President of the United States may, at his discretion, at any time hereafter call for any number of men as volunteers for the respective terms of one, two, and three years for military service; and any such volunteer, or, in case of draft, as subsequently provided in the bill, any substitute, is to be credited to the town, township, precinct, or election district, toward the quota of which he may have volunteered or engaged as a substitute; and every volunteer and substitute who is accepted and mustered into the service for a term of one year, unless sooner discharged, is to receive, and be paid by the United States, a bounty of $200; and if for a term of two years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $300; and if for a term of three years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $400; one half of which bounty is to be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into the service, one fourth at the expiration of one half of his term of service, and one fourth at the expiration of his term of service. In case of his death while in service, the residue of his bounty unpaid is to be paid to his widow, if he shall have left a widow; if not, to his children, or if there be none, to his legal representatives. In case he is honorably discharged by reason of wounds or sickness incurred in the service in the line of his duty, he is to receive full bounty. In case the quota, or any part thereof, of any town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, or of any county not so subdivided, shall not be filled within the space of sixty days after such call, then the President is to order a draft for one year to fill such quota, or any part thereof, which may be unfilled; and in case of any such draft no payment of money is to be accepted or received by the Government as commutation to release any enrolled or drafted man from personal obligation to perform military service.

It is to be lawful for the Executive of any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, who are to be credited to the State, and to the respective subdivisions thereof, which may procure the enlistment; and drafted men, substitutes, and volunteers, when mustered in, are to be organized in, or assigned to, regiments, batteries, or other organizations of their own States, and, as far as practicable, shall, when assigned, be permitted to select their own regiments, batteries, or other organizations from among those of their respective States which at the time of assignment may not be filled to their maximum number.

The twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, is to be construed so as to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in that section; and hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited is to be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer is to be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1864, is to be amended so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for fifty per cent. in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district as provided by that section.

Instead of traveling pay, all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous are to be allowed transportation from their places of residence, and persons discharged at the place of rendezvous are to be allowed transportation to their places of residence.

All persons in the naval service of the United States who have entered the service during the present rebellion, who have not been credited to the quota of any town, district, ward, or State, by reason of their being in the service and not enrolled prior to February 24, 1864, are to be enrolled and credited to the quotas of the town, ward, district, or State in which they respectively reside.

If any person duly drafted shall be absent from home in prosecution of his usual business, the provost marshal of the district is to cause him to be duly notified as soon as may be, and he is not to be deemed a deserter, nor liable as such, until notice has been given to him and reasonable time allowed for him to return and report to the provost marshal of his district; but such absence is not otherwise to affect his liability.

Nothing contained in this act is to be construed to alter or in any way affect the law relative to those conscientiously opposed to bearing arms.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment was in section one, lines six and seven, after the word "volunteer," to strike out the words, "or, in case of draft, as hereinafter provided, any substitute;" so that it will read:

That the President of the United States may, at his discretion, at any time hereafter, call for any number of men as volunteers, for the respective terms of one, two, and three years, for military service; and any such volunteer shall be credited, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know why the committee propose to strike out those words.

Mr. WILSON. I will state the reason. The bill proposes to give to any person who will enlist within sixty days for one year, a bounty of $200, $300 for two years, and $400 for three years, and it provides that then the President may draft, and the drafted person for one year has no bounty whatever, but if he gets a substitute the substitute is to have a bounty of $200. What we want to do is to encourage personal service and not encourage a man to get a substitute. The provision is clearly wrong and ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the person will be entitled to procure a substitute after this draft.

Mr. WILSON. He may procure a substitute and pay for him instead of the country paying him $200.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight of section one, after the word "township," to insert the words "ward of a city;" and in line nine, after the word "district" to insert "or of a county not so subdivided;" so that the clause will read:

And any such volunteer shall be credited to the town, township, ward of a city, precinct, or election district, or of a county not so subdivided, toward the quota of which he may have volunteered or engaged as a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. That is to make the bill conform to the existing law.

Mr. HOWE. Will it be in order to move to strike out that whole clause after this amendment is made?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair thinks it will be in order. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line nine, after the word "volunteer" to strike out the words "or engaged as a substitute;" and in the same line after "volunteers" to strike out the words "and substitute."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line seventeen, to strike out the words "one half" and insert "one third;" and in line nineteen to strike out "one fourth" and insert "one third;" and in line twenty to strike out "one fourth" and insert "one third;" so that the clause will read:

One third of which bounty shall be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into the service, one third at the expiration of one half of his term of service, and one third at the expiration of his term of service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-four, after the word "representative" to strike out the following clause:

And in case he is honorably discharged by reason of wounds or sickness incurred in the line of his duty he shall receive full bounty.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know why these words are stricken out.

Mr. WILSON. By the existing law a soldier who is honorably discharged from the service for wounds received in battle receives his bounty; but this provision it was believed would disorganize the present Army and those that would be put into it. It provides that persons discharged by reason of wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall receive full bounty. The tendency of such a measure will be demoralizing on the existing Army. That is the unanimous opinion of the officers in the service, and there is no justice in it. The law takes care of the wounded now, and sickness is so indefinite a term, so uncertain, that it will not do to put it in here. A man may be sick and discharged from the line of service and be as well within a week afterwards as ever he was.

Mr. HOWE. I entirely agree that this provision for paying bounties to those who are discharged by reason of sickness is wrong; but if you strike out the words "or sickness" you would affect—

Mr. FOSTER. Wounds are provided for by law.

Mr. HOWE. I know there is a law providing for paying bounties existing under former laws.

Mr. FOSTER. It covers all during the war.

Mr. HOWE. If there is no doubt about that this would be unnecessary.

Mr. WILSON. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. HOWE. I have looked at the law and I thought there was some doubt about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line two, after the word "ward" to insert the words "of a city."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line four, before the word "days" to strike out "sixty" and insert "forty;" so that it will read:

That in case the quota, or any part thereof, of any town, township, ward of a city, precinct, or election district, or of any county not so subdivided, shall not be filled within the space of forty days after such call, then the President shall order a draft, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, shall be construed to mean that the Secretary of War shall discharge minors under the age of eighteen years under the circumstances and on the conditions prescribed in said section; and hereafter if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Some portions of this section I desire not to see stricken out. I think this provision of the section ought to remain:

And hereafter, if any officer of the United States shall knowingly enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer shall be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

A person under the age of sixteen years is not fit to do military duty. It is certainly not the interest of the country that the children should be brought into the Army.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that the latter part of the section beginning with the words "and hereafter" I should be willing to have stand, to punish any officer who should muster into the service any child under sixteen years of age; but the first part of it is believed would demoralize the service.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the word "knowingly." It is not important whether the officer knows it or not. It is against the true interests of the country to have children in the Army. Then I suggest to him to strike out that part which punishes the officer. That ought not to be in a law like this. Then the section will stand merely directing the discharge of any person under sixteen years of age unconditionally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order to amend the section before the question is taken on striking out.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the Senator's proposition to be to preserve the latter part of this section, beginning at the word "hereafter" in the eighth line, and to abandon the other parts? The first part of the section, the first eight lines, down to the word "and" I think it very important should go out of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that part.

Mr. WILSON. By existing law the Secretary of War can discharge from the service any minor on the representation to him that he ought to be discharged. He has got the power; it is confided to him. The minor has to swear that he is eighteen years old or our officers are forbidden to muster him into the service. If we should pass this section as it comes from the House of Representatives we should have a clamor for the dismissal of men; and I have no doubt many men twenty-two or twenty-three years old would be dismissed from service under it. The previous law was so framed as to prevent that very thing. We found that persons had been mustered out of the service, and the Secretary of War had discharged as minors persons who afterwards proved to be over twenty-one years of age. I should be willing to retain that part of the section in reference to boys under sixteen years old.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the word "knowingly" in the ninth line; and in the thirteenth line after the word "officer" to insert the words "who shall knowingly."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who shall knowingly what?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Who shall knowingly enlist boys under sixteen years of age.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Here is the point that I make to the Senator from Massachusetts: I think the boy ought to be dismissed from the service on considerations of public policy, if he is under sixteen years of age, whether the officer knew his age at the time he enlisted him or not. That is the ground I take. I do not want it to be restricted in this way. My attention was called to this matter yesterday. I received a letter from a very intelligent citizen of Indianapolis, informing me that without his knowledge his child under fifteen years of age was enlisted and was going down to the army of the Cumberland, and he wanted me to appeal to the Secretary of War for his discharge. I called upon the Secretary of War and he merely replied to me that he would not discharge anybody.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the honorable Senator that he can carry out his idea, in the thirteenth line, by saying "any recruiting or mustering officer who shall knowingly muster into the service any person, &c., shall be punished."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the word "knowingly" in the ninth line.

Mr. WILSON. Then the section would read in this way:

That hereafter if any officer of the United States shall enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer who shall knowingly enlist or muster him into the service, &c., shall be dismissed the service.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I think that would be right. We should strike out all of the section down to the word "hereafter" and then take the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. And strike out the word "hereafter."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let that be included in the motion.

Mr. WILSON. Very well; strike that out too. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts so modify his amendment?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the section as proposed to be amended, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any officer of the United States shall enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged; and such recruiting or mustering officer who shall knowingly enlist any person under sixteen years of age shall be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by adding after the words "unconditionally discharged" the words "upon repayment of the bounty received."

Mr. HOWE. I am really very sorry to have the first part of the section stricken out. I insist upon it that the Government has no right to hold a person under the age of eighteen years, enlisted without the consent of the parent or guardian, in the military service. They are not capable of making any kind of contract by your law, and yet you allow them to make this contract.

Mr. GRIMES. We can make a law to take them.

Mr. HOWE. But all the wisdom that has gone before us has decided that they ought not to be allowed to make contracts; and here you allow them to make a contract the most damaging to themselves that is possible to conceive of, and you hold them bound by that contract. I think it is morally wrong; and then again I think it is economically wrong. I do not believe that these boys under eighteen years of age can do the duty of a soldier or earn the pay of a soldier. You, however, allow them to take the place of a soldier, to count in filling up the quota of a town or a district, and to take the full pay of a soldier. It is wrong to the Government as well as to the child and to society.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that if you do not strike out this provision persons will be discharged from the Army who are twenty-three or twenty-four years old. I cannot understand how any such consequence is to follow or ought to be anticipated. The age of a person can be established almost invariably, and the possibility that some youth can be found whose age cannot be established and proved satisfactorily ought not lead us to countenance an act of this kind. I recollect when the question of enlisting young men under twenty years of age was first mooted here in the Senate, when you decreed that you would only enlist those who were upwards of twenty, it was then said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and it was said, I think, by the judgment of nearly the whole Senate, that a man not twenty years of age was not fit to serve, his constitution was not firm, was not established; he could not endure the hardships of military life, and that it was demoralizing the service to take such young men into it. I am surprised now to hear the same Senator insist upon holding men in the service two years younger than that.

Mr. GRIMES. If this were a question as to whether we should conscript or authorize volunteer of the age mentioned in this section, I am not clear but that I should vote with the Senator from Wisconsin. But that is not the question. The question here is, whether or not we will so change the law by allowing this section of the bill to stand as to deplete our Army by drawing from it such persons as may claim to be under this age of eighteen. The question, therefore, is whether we, as the representatives of the States, at this particular juncture are prepared to throw discord, as I think it would be, into the Army by declaring that from the time this bill shall pass into a law, every person who is below the age specified in this section shall be immediately discharged by the Secretary of War. I think the Senator's ideas are right as an original proposition, and that young men ought not to be enlisted until they are capable of enduring fatigue. Those who are now in the Army and under the age specified in this section have shown that they are capable of enduring the hardships of a campaign; and I think it would not be wise in the Senate for us to declare that all those men shall be permitted to leave the Army at this time. I think, on the other hand, it was wise on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out from the House bill the section which they propose to strike out, or this part of it.

Mr. CARLILE. I do not understand that the section if adopted, as proposed to be amended, would have the effect which the Senator from Iowa supposes it would; that is, the effect to discharge persons now in the Army under the age of eighteen years. If the first part of the section had been retained it would have had that effect.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the very question that the Senator from Wisconsin was arguing about.

Mr. CARLILE. But I understand the Senate to agree to strike out the first part.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to striking out this part; and that is what I was talking about.

Mr. CARLILE. I desire to accomplish the purpose which the Senator from Wisconsin has in view by allowing the first part of the section to be stricken out, and so amending the latter part as to insert "eighteen" instead of "sixteen" years; so that it will read:

If any officer of the United States shall enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of eighteen years he shall be discharged, &c.

I propose that amendment to strike out "sixteen" and insert "eighteen." The first part of the section being stricken out, the adoption of this amendment requiring persons under eighteen to be discharged can only apply to those hereafter enlisted under this bill. This bill cannot have a retroactive effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia to move an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot pile up amendments in this way. The first amendment was to strike out the whole section; then an amendment was made to strike out a part of the section; and now we have another motion to strike out a part of the portion retained. It seems to me that cannot be done. The Senator can move his amendment at some subsequent stage of the proceedings, but it seems to me we have too many amendments now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the proposition of the committee to strike out the whole section does not preclude amendment. That has been amended to a certain extent, and the amendment is still amendable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that there is an amendment to the amendment pending now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I do not understand the condition of the section. I understood the Senator from Indiana to propose an amendment to this amendment of the committee, and that has not been acted upon yet.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think there was a vote on that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We voted on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, but we have voted on no other.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The one I offered was adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not so understand it. The Secretary can ascertain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. WILSON. I think the question stands in this way: the committee reported in favor of striking out the entire section. The Senator from Indiana moved to amend to preserve the part of the section from the word "and," and proposed an amendment to that, which was adopted. Then the Senator from Connecticut moved to add other words, so that the latter clause of this section is complete now, I believe. Now the question is on striking out the first eight lines of the section down to and including the word "and."

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that be so, clearly the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is not in order, because he does not propose to amend the words proposed to be stricken out, but another part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana has not yet been acted upon. That is the first motion before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what that amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section as proposed to be amended will be reported.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any officer of the United States shall enlist or muster into the military service any person under the age of sixteen years, with or without the consent of his parent or guardian, such person so enlisted or recruited shall be immediately and unconditionally discharged upon repayment of the bounty received; and such recruiting or mustering officer who shall knowingly enlist any person under sixteen years of age shall be dismissed the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not ascertained yet what the question is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that section as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On adopting it as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On adopting it as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana after the word "officer" in the thirteenth line has ever been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the very amendment now before the Senate to be acted upon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then the question is not on agreeing to the amendment as amended, but on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are several amendments. The question will be on agreeing to the several amendments made to this section.

Mr. WILSON. I think the whole trouble grows out of the fact that the question has not been put on striking out the first eight lines of the section. When those are stricken out, what is left is what the Senator from Indiana desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be accomplished by adopting the amendment moved by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is it? Will the Chair direct the Secretary to report the amendment of the Senator from Indiana? He has read to us the section as amended. I want to know what is the amendment proposed, if I can ascertain.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section five after the word "that" in the first line by striking out down to the word "hereafter" in the eighth line inclusive.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not understand the Senator from Indiana to move that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That part of my amendment I will withdraw. We will perfect the latter part of the section first.

The SECRETARY. In line nine it is proposed to strike out the word "knowingly."

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for a separate vote on each amendment. We shall get through sooner in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on striking out the word "knowingly."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen after the word "officer" to insert the word "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen after the word "shall" to insert "knowingly enlist any person under sixteen years of age shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARLILE. I now move to strike out in the tenth line the word "sixteen" and insert "eighteen."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the effect of his proposition. The act of February last provided as follows:

"That the Secretary of War may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge when it shall appear upon due proof that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians."

That authorized, and I think, giving the proper construction to the word "may," directed, the Secretary of War to discharge any minor under eighteen years of age who was enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian. If the parent or guardian has given the consent, then between the ages of eighteen and sixteen the enlistment would be held good as we have amended this section.

Mr. CARLILE. That is exactly what I wish to avoid. The same reason that requires the discharge of one under sixteen years of age requires the discharge of one under eighteen.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator withdraw that for a moment to allow the question to be settled on striking out the first eight lines?

Mr. CARLILE. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line down to the word "if" in the eighth line.

Mr. HOWE. That is precisely the amendment that I do not want made. If these boys ought to render military service, they ought to be drafted just as much as anybody else. If you mean to hold them as soldiers, you must hold them because it is their duty to do the duty of soldiers or because they agree to it. I say you ought not to base any obligation upon their contract, for it is not the policy of the law to allow them to make contracts. They are not capable of making contracts. They have parents or they have guardians; if not, the State is their guardian; and you ought not to allow them to make such contracts. I put it to the Senate, and to the Senator from Massachusetts, that there is no possible way of proving that a person is under eighteen that does not exist for proving he is under sixteen.

Mr. WILSON. This applies to the future.

Mr. HOWE. Very well. You can prove just as well what the age of a person is who enlisted last year as the age of a person who shall enlist next year. It is the fact of age that is to be established, and the facility of proving it does not depend on the time when he enlisted, nor does it depend on whether he is eighteen or sixteen. You can prove one age as well as another.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust these words will not be stricken out. I cannot see how their retention is to demoralize the Army, or have any such bad effect; and I am really quite surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts does not agree to retain them. I think the Senator from Indiana is correct in his construction of the law, that it is the duty now of the Secretary of War to discharge these persons who are enlisted under eighteen years of age. I know that recruiting officers have gone out in the country, and, in their anxiety to get recruits, have induced boys to enlist without the consent of their parents, and that there has been no remedy. It has been very difficult to get those boys discharged. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to this clause because he says it will demoralize the Army, and persons twenty-five years of age will be discharged. Not at all. The law is very carefully guarded. Let me read it. The words proposed to be stricken out, it will be observed, refer to the twentieth section of the act of February 24, 1864. The twentieth section of that act is as follows:

"That the Secretary of War may order the discharge"—

The word "may" is used here, and all the change proposed is to make it "shall"—

"may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge, when it shall appear, upon due proof, that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians: And provided further, That such persons, their parents or guardians, shall first repay to the Government, and to the State and local authorities, all bounties and advance pay which may have been paid to them, anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding."

What must be done under this law if these words are retained in the fifth section of this bill in order to obtain the discharge of a minor under eighteen years of age? He must make an application to be discharged; he must satisfy the Secretary of War, on due proof, that he is under eighteen years of age at the time he makes his application; he must also prove to the Secretary of War that he enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian; he must further refund all the bounty he has received, whether paid by the Government or local authorities, and all advance pay which he has received. Is it going to demoralize the Army for the Secretary of War to do that? There ought not to be any such person in the Army under eighteen years of age when he makes the application, no matter what his age may have been when he enlisted. He must show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War all these things before he can get a discharge; and we are told that will demoralize the Army! No such person should be in the Army, or else our laws are all wrong. I have known instances; several have come under my personal observation; I have seen in this city a gentleman all the way from my State, more than a thousand miles, who has come here with the proofs showing that his son, under eighteen years of age, had been seduced away from home and enlisted or volunteered, though the boy denied that he had ever volunteered, yet he was reported as having enlisted and gone into the service, and he could get no redress. Such things ought not to be. Our law is based upon the idea—and the Senator from Massachusetts wants it that way; he does not propose to change it—that it is disadvantageous to have in the service persons under eighteen years of age. You agree to that. They cannot get out if these words remain, unless the Secretary of War is satisfied of all these things. It is left to him—

Mr. WILSON. It is there now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; he does not act. He construes this to be discretionary, and he refuses to act. Now we want it obligatory on him, when he is satisfied of all these facts, when the application is made, and he is satisfied that the age of the applicant is under eighteen, and he is further satisfied that his parents and guardians knew nothing of his enlistment, and is further satisfied that the bounty and advance pay he has received is all paid back, then there is no use in holding that boy in the service. It is prejudicial to the service, and he ought to be discharged. Why not, then, let these words remain, and let him be discharged?

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator if in his opinion, this will not discharge minors under eighteen years of age who enlisted with the consent of their parents.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not one, because it is provided expressly here, "when it shall appear on due proof that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians." The law is very carefully worded. It must appear that there was no implied consent for them to enlist.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. CARLILE. I now move the amendment I submitted a short time ago to strike out "sixteen" and insert "eighteen" in line ten.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This section is now perfected, and the question will be on striking out the section as amended.

Mr. HOWE. I take it, of course the Senate will not strike out the whole section when they have agreed not to strike out a part. ["No," "No."]

The motion to strike out was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was in section six, line eight, to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so that it will read:

That section three of an act, &c., be, and the same is hereby, amended, so as to authorize and direct district provost marshals, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for one hundred per cent. in addition to the number required to fill the quota of any district.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that under the original act the draft may be for fifty per cent. more than the amount called for. By the construction of the act of February 24, 1864, it is thought you can draft for only the number called for. Experience proves that we hold just about fifty per cent. of the men, and by drafting one hundred per cent. additional, the thing is all done at once, and a great deal is saved of the expense of traveling of the officers, of giving notice, &c., and a great deal of time is saved too, because we have to draft over and over again if we fall short. Therefore by drafting one hundred per cent. additional it was thought you would hold the number wanted, and save a great deal of time and expense to the Government and no harm would be done to anybody.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of July, 1864, hospital matrons shall be entitled to and shall receive twelve dollars per month and one ration.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section twelve of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and is hereby, so amended that the notice to be served on drafted men may be served within ten days after such draft and at any time within six months thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That payments which have been made by paymasters to non-commissioned officers of volunteer regiments from the date of their enrollment and for a time previous to their muster into the service of the United States, shall, if otherwise correct, be allowed in the settlement of such paymasters' accounts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am opposed to that amendment because it is not germane to the bill. I think it is bad enough for the rest of us to throw into a bill incongruous matter without the chairman of the committee attempting to do it.

Mr. WILSON. The committee unanimously agreed to these sections a week ago, and they are on a bill now pending before the House of Representatives; but we thought we could put them on this bill and save all trouble.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it save taking up the other bill altogether?

Mr. WILSON. That was what I intended to do; but I will withdraw the amendment if anybody thinks it will embarrass this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The objection is this: when persons examine laws and inspect them they look to the title, and do not expect to find under one title things relating to another; and they are often ignorant of the law because of this kind of legislation.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment and all the amendments that I intended to propose as new sections, even the one agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those agreed to are all right; but I suggest to the Senator to keep off this bill everything which does not relate to the subject-matter of the draft.

Mr. BROWN. Do I understand the chairman to withdraw those amendments?

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw them all.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say in behalf of myself and of other members of the Committee on Military Affairs that while they have not deemed it necessary to make a minority report on this bill, and while they concur in the amendments that have been presented by the chairman, they do not approve of the bill as it stands. On the contrary, they believe that this measure, if passed in its present shape, will be fatal to the military system of the United States. I do not desire to enter into any protracted discussion of the various propositions which are embraced in the bill, because we have already considered at length most of the points involved, but I will present some considerations that I think ought to be laid before the Senate.

Sir, what is the object of this bill? Is it to raise white troops or is it to raise colored troops? If the object be to raise colored troops, then it will perhaps accomplish the end designed, but accomplish it at a far more extravagant rate than could be done under the present law. And that such will be its result whatever may have been the design must be very apparent. That section of the bill which authorizes the several Governors of the loyal States to send agents into those States declared to be in insurrection and there recruit to fill their quotas will give nothing but colored troops as that quota, and the persistency with which that feature of it is adhered to shows that that is the main point in the bill. It is to provide for changing the Army from its present form into one composed of freedmen put in as substitutes. But if you go into the insurrectionary districts and there enlist freedmen under this bill, you are required by this bill to give them a bounty of $400. Let Senators consider, however, that under the law as it now stands, it is competent for the Government of the United States to enlist all the colored troops that it can find access to, all the freedmen in the insurrectionary districts who are willing to enlist, and the bounty is $100 for three years' service. Where the advantage, then, of this bill, which provides a bounty of $400 for three years' service and a proportionate amount for any less period of actual service? I say, therefore, that if it is intended by this bill to raise colored troops, it will be a far more expensive system than the present one which we now have in operation. It is a fact that will be attested by many Senators here, that we have had petition after petition coming to us from officers in the Army now engaged in the southern States, asking for permission to recruit their regiments and brigades under the present law, and that those permissions have not been freely granted; on the contrary, it has been with difficulty that any such permits have been obtained, and the Government instead of exerting all its power, all its efforts, all its zeal to bring in this class of recruits has rather been hesitant in its action. It was perfectly within the power of the Administration to have had three hundred thousand colored troops now in the service if it had so determined and had carried out its resolution with any degree of vigor. Does then the Government now want such troops? Is the appeal which it makes to us to amend the enrollment law simply with a view of such a recruitment of our armies? Thus the first consideration of the important sections of this bill returns us upon the inquiry whether the object be to raise colored troops.

I say, then, that in view of the evident practical working of the bill now under consideration, which is to authorize the States to appoint agents to go and get from those districts which are in insurrection colored recruits who are to be put in as substitutes to fill their quota, and who, when they come in as substitutes, will be entitled under the first section of the bill to a bounty of $400, according to the term of service, it will be a far more expensive system than if the Government were now to require its agents and officers to recruit for the Army of the United States in those districts and pay the bounty as provided by law, which amounts to only $100 altogether. I cannot see, therefore, in what shape or in what manner this bill is going to be a benefit to the Government, and I do see how it is going to be an immense charge upon the Treasury of the United States.

But it has been argued by some in the course of informal discussions which have taken place on this subject that the bounty of $400 here contemplated will produce white enlistments more certainly than the present law. I very much doubt this, even if the recruitment were confined to white troops. I call attention to the fact that, under the law as it stands, we provide for a bounty of $100, and exact from those failing to serve a commutation, which is $300. The Government has in its possession that sum also for the purpose of getting a substitute, so that the $100 and the $300 together give to the Government $400 in cash, being a more effective means of obtaining a white recruit and of filling its armies through the system of bounty, than the present bill can by possibility give; because the whole amount of $300 under the old law is to be paid down in cash in hand and the $100 only withheld in part, whereas this bounty of $400 proposed in the bill before you is to be distributed over a period of three years. Therefore, so far as the question of procuring white recruits from the bounty which is here spoken of is concerned, it will be impossible to get them with the same facility that we can get them under the present law.

But let us look a little more closely at the financial aspect of this new measure of enrollment and calling out the national forces. The bill as it came from the House called for a draft, and then required the Government to pay a bounty to substitutes in place of those who refused to respond to the draft. Here is the proposition which ought to be preserved as a memento of how a great nation proposes to save itself in the hour of mortal combat:

SEC. L. * * * and any such volunteer (or, in case of draft, as hereinafter provided, any substitute) shall be credited to the town, township, precinct, or election district, toward the quota of which he may have volunteered or engaged as a substitute; and every volunteer (and substitute) who is accepted and mustered into the service for a term of one year, unless sooner discharged, shall receive, and be paid by the United States, a bounty of $200; and if for a term of two years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $300; and if for a term of three years, unless sooner discharged, a bounty of $400; one half of which bounty shall be paid to the soldier at the time of his being mustered into the service, one fourth at the expiration of one half of his term of service, and one fourth at the expiration of his term of service.

But the Senate has stricken the word "substitute" out, and I therefore shall leave the proposition to the ridicule of the country. The element of it, however, which proposes to reintroduce on the part of the Government a large system of bounties is one that if carried out and practicable would very soon settle all the financial embarrassments of our nation in bankruptcy. Where is this money to come from? Why do you resort to draft if you can get volunteers by a $400 bounty? You abolish commutation, which was held to furnish the means of paying bounties for volunteers or substitutes, and provide no other mode of raising the money. Is the Treasury so flourishing that it can go on with an experiment which, if I am rightly informed, has been the real cause of present difficulties in the Treasury Department? Is it simply intended to give this $400 to all the colored troops the Governors of the several States may get to fill their quota, and then draft white citizens without paying any bounty to make up the number of the quota that may not be quite filled? Is it that the United States shall pay $400 apiece bounty to all the freedmen the Governors shall get into the service, and that the people of those States who thereby escape the draft shall pay nothing? That would be a shrewd dodge indeed. Let me illustrate. In Illinois the draft is enforced and furnishes thirty thousand men. It is compulsory service and no bounties paid. In Massachusetts thirty thousand freedmen are got in South Carolina to fill her quota; the United States pays out $12,000,000 in bounties to those so-called volunteers, and no draft is enforced. It will not do to say that Illinois can do the same, because that brings you directly down to the idea on which I wish to rivet attention—that you will bankrupt the Government. Every hundred thousand men thus raised will cost you forty or fifty million dollars; and where is the money to come from, or if supplied by new issues where will be the limit to the depreciation of the currency?

I need not dilate on the question whether this clause will be taken advantage of by the States and their Governors or not. It must be transparent to every one that under so broad a provision for furnishing "substitutes" under the disguised name of "volunteers," and making the Government pay the cost of getting them, it must be transparent to every one that the States that can raise the trifling advance of money needed to secure such colored troops will promptly send their agents and draw their quota from the States that are in insurrection; in other words, that their quota will come in the shape of the enlisted freedmen of the South, and not in the shape of white soldiers. There is another grave consideration that should be reflected upon. If the quotas are to come in that shape, if all these Governors are going to run a race and these thousands of agents are going into the process of kidnapping and crimping and bribing to get these substitutes down at the South, I ask you how are you going to fill up your old regiments of white troops that are now wasting away along the lines below Richmond? Will you fill them up with these freedmen? Your regulations provide that they shall not go into the same regiments. How then are you going to fill up those old regiments? Are you going to let your white brigades waste away? Are you going to let them dwindle down to a mere skeleton of officers, and have your quotas altogether made up of this class of troops? That is going to be the effect of it in spite of all that can be done. You see all the Governors of States, all the politicians of the country, every man who is electioneering for an office, to the work of inciting the filling up of the Army quotas with this class of recruits or substitutes, to be gathered from the South; and how many do you suppose will be found among the citizens at home to volunteer when it is represented to them that for a trifling sum they can get a substitute of this kind? Will it not totally destroy all volunteering on the part of the white citizens?

Mr. President, I venture to say that if this bill is adopted it will be the most fatal blow that has yet been struck at the prosecution of this war, and the most fatal blow at the military power of the Government. It is not alone that you cannot put your system of drafting, as it is called, into force for forty days no matter what the emergency, but even when put into force it will prove a sham system, that simply encourages substitutes hired or caught or brought from the southern States.

Mr. President, I desire simply to vindicate the protest which the minority, if I may so call an equally divided committee, have thought proper to enter against the passage of this bill. For my own part I have stood here from the beginning of this session contending all the while that if we are to make our armies effective we must come down to the absolute draft and repeal all commutation clauses. I affirm that we have no right to sacrifice the military power of this Government to the exigencies of a political campaign, for that is the meaning of this sugar-coating. I say that I have contended from the time of taking my seat in this body that such decision is the supreme requirement of the conflict, and I have seen nothing to change my view in any of the events that have transpired or the necessities which have accumulated upon the Government. What was predicted four months since—that before this session ended you would be compelled to repeal this commutation clause—has come to pass; and now when the necessity is upon us, when we feel the need of men and not of money, when the demand comes up from the armies, amid the turmoil of lost or sanguinary battles, for the best soldiers of the land, and the recruiting of all the regiments of the different States and the filling them up to their maximum with the bone and sinew of the country, we are presented not with an intrinsically strong, compact, energetic measure, but with one that is nothing but a sham, under pretense of which it is hoped to tide over a presidential campaign.

I have given as far as able every vote that I possibly could in this assembly to carry on an energetic military administration. I propose to do so still. I am willing to-day, to assure a strong, vigorous conduct of this war, to vote money and vote men; but I am not willing to vote for a measure that produces no men such as we most need, but that spends millions of money that we have not got. Colored troops are a very valuable auxiliary force in this war, they can be put to great uses and their organization should be warmly encouraged, but it does not and the people of this nation will never consent that this war shall rest for its prosecution exclusively or even principally on their substituted valor. When it comes to that the civilized world will accept the foregone conclusion that the struggle is ended.

Mr. President, the whole character of this bill discloses itself in the section on which I have commented, and I have therefore passed by minor matters that might otherwise claim consideration. Let me add one word, however, as to the general scope of the bill and the spirit in which it was conceived and passed in the other branch of this Congress.

I venture to say that if there be one measure which more than any other is calculated to interrupt and destroy the harmony and the confidence which during the progress of this war has existed between the eastern and western States, that measure is this one. It is known that one section of the country is poor comparatively—a newly populated section and drained of its agricultural labor by the war—the other is wealthy, with large manufacturing and other interests and dense populations; and the moment you adopt that system, the moment it is known that half the States that are engaged in carrying on this war are contributing nothing in the shape of men but are going down to procure their substitutes by purchase, then you will arouse feelings in the western States that it will be impossible for politicians or platform-makers to put down. The people of the West will feel that it is an injustice; they will feel that it is no longer a common cause; they will feel as if the gauntlet had been thrown down by the eastern or capital States to this effect, that the war if fought out at all must be fought out by their money and what it will fetch by colored soldiers alone, and not by their sons and brothers; and I tell you when that gauntlet is thrown down the men of the West will not stand to any such distribution of the burdens of this conflict. They are willing, yea resolute to go forward as we have gone forward; but they require that we shall adopt measures of energy, measures of equal bearing all over the country to sustain this war as they have sustained it heretofore. You must not make what will appear to them an invidious discrimination between wealth and their own contributions in the shape of men or it will arouse a sectional jealousy which may prove fatal to the cause of freedom on the continent.

Mr. President, I move to amend the bill by striking out the third section.

The Secretary read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Executive of any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, who shall be credited to the State, and to the respective subdivisions thereof, which may procure the enlistment.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senate should decide not to strike that out, will the section be susceptible of amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will, in the opinion of the Chair. It can be amended before or afterwards.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to vote with the Senator from Missouri, but I think if he will allow the section to be modified in the way that I propose it will carry out his views.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly. I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not ask it to be withdrawn unless the amendment meets his views. I propose to make the section read in this way:

That it shall be the duty of the President to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, to be organized, armed, and equipped as United States volunteers, according to existing law, and who shall receive the pay, bounty, and pensions provided for other troops in the military service of the United States.

There are a large class of people, both white and black, in the southern States who ought to be enlisted. They have not had opportunities to enlist in many cases, because the authorities would not or could not afford them proper facilities; but as we now propose to give them large bounties I have no doubt they can be enlisted and mustered in as United States volunteers.

Mr. BROWN. That is just what I want, and I will accept the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Ohio if the President has not that power now.

Mr. SHERMAN. He has power to pay a bounty, but it is limited to $100. By the first section of this bill the bounty will be increased very largely.

Mr. WILSON. The President now has all the power embodied in the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except the power to pay the bounty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out this section, and the Senator from Ohio proposes to modify it in a certain way.

Mr. BROWN. I accept the modification of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that point. It is not in his power to accept a modification of a bill before the Senate without a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose I can withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can withdraw his motion to strike out.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not necessary to do that. I can move to amend before the Senator's motion is put. That will end the matter perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out in the second line of the third section the words "lawful for the Executive of any of the States" and to insert the words "the duty of the President;" in line four to strike out the words "under any call;" and then in line five, after the word "be," to strike out the residue of the section in these words, "credited to the State, and to the respective subdivisions thereof, which may procure the enlistment," and insert "organized, armed, and equipped as United States volunteers according to existing law, and who shall receive the pay, bounty, and pension prescribed for other troops in the military service of the United States. The section will then read:

That it shall be the duty of the President to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under the provisions of this act, who shall be organized, armed, and equipped as United States volunteers according to existing law, and who shall receive the pay, bounty, and pension prescribed for other troops in the military service of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I will say a word or two in explanation of this section of the bill from the House of Representatives.

In the early part of the session, believing it to be of great importance to enlist into the service of the United States the poor white men of the rebel States and also the black men, believing that we could raise thousands of these poor white men and tens of thousands of black men by interesting the people of the States who have raised nearly all the soldiers raised during this war in their enlistment, I proposed this measure. I proposed it because I believed it would weaken the enemy and give strength to our country; that it would be for the benefit of Union men in the rebel States who were poor and oppressed, and that it would bring into the service tens of thousands of colored men whose labor was now used in support of the rebellion.

Last autumn, when the Government was doing very little to raise colored troops, although they had been authorized from July, 1862, an earnest, determined man went before the people, raised $60,000 in money, and went into the State of Tennessee and some other parts of the country and organized sixteen regiments and put them into the service of the United States, and not a man of those counted to the people who had contributed the money, and the man who raised them gave all his time and spent several thousand dollars besides. I believed that the men who were in favor of raising this class of troops and who would give money to do it would be further encouraged by allowing the men they raised to be credited to the community that made the contribution. I never dreamed that it would excite one portion of the country against the other, but I supposed that the patriotic men of all sections of the country would hail and welcome every man raised by the labor or the money of any section or portion of the loyal States. I believe that if such a proposition as this had been adopted six months ago it would have put at least one hundred thousand men into the service of the United States who have not been put there. I know it would harm no section of the country; it would weaken no section of the country. It might excite some prejudices, but they would be prejudices that would be excited for no reasonable cause.

When I made this proposition here it received but little support in the Senate, and it went over. I hoped that there would be a change of sentiment and that the measure would yet receive the sanction of the Senate. But, sir, a member of the House of Representatives, a major general in the Army of the United States—I mean General Blair—the Representative of a State west of the Mississippi river, came to me and asked for the bill. He took the bill, made such modifications in it as he saw fit, and offered it in the House of Representatives. A gentleman from Ohio, who himself had been a major general in the service of the United States and who had raised troops, said the first white troops raised in Tennessee were refugees from Alabama, and when that bill was pending he said it was the most important measure to strengthen the country that had been proposed in the House of Representatives. He might have erred in judgment, but that was the opinion he expressed. The House of Representatives passed the bill by a vote of about two to one. The Military Committee of this body reported in favor of it, and I have tried to obtain a vote of the Senate upon it, but never brought it up at any time when it appeared to me I could get a majority of the Senate for it; and so it has passed on from that time to this.

This very principle in other language has been embodied in this bill by a vote of the House of Representatives. It is here before us to-night, and we must pronounce upon it. The Senator from Missouri thinks it will be a source of weakness. If I thought so I would vote against it. I do not think so. I see no reason why any man should object to it. I see that: that although the Government of the United States wants men we have raised but very few colored men since the 1st of January last. There are some reasons why we do not. In the first place this long, long dispute about the pay of these soldiers has kept tens of thousands of them, in my judgment, out of the service. Then the barbarities of the rebels, their cruelties, which we cannot protect these men from, have doubtless deterred many of them from enlisting; and then comes this fact, that the Federal Government is a very poor agent to enlist men. That is my judgment about it. Although we have our provost marshals up and down the country, nineteen twentieths of the men enlisted are really enlisted through the influence of the people of the localities of the men, of the wards, the towns, the districts, and not by the positive toil and labor of the national Government officers. That is the truth about it. We all know it. They are doing and have done but very little to raise colored troops during the last six months. I think we could have had, and ought to have had, a quarter of a million of them in the field; and if we had we should have no occasion for this bill, no occasion for any change of our laws. We have in the service many thousands of them now. They are probably not increasing, and have not increased in four or five months. They are holding important points. They are doing duty faithfully. If this section remains in the bill the people of the cities, towns, counties, and States will use their influence to enlist white men and black men everywhere they can find them, putting of course the black men into black regiments and the white men into the regiments already in the field. I think that provision will put a great many thousand men into the Army.

But now I come to another point. We have so amended this bill that when the President issues a call for troops these volunteers must volunteer in forty days. If the quota is not filled up in forty days, then the President is directed to make a draft to fill up the balance, and when the men are drafted they have ten days to report by themselves or by substitutes, the commutation clause being abolished. They have but ten days to do it, and they must report themselves or report by substitute in that time, and of course they have no great time to search the disloyal States for any class of men. I think that this section, which I understand has a very earnest and strong support in the House of Representatives, if it is permitted to remain in this bill, will add many thousand men during six months to the military force of the United States, and it will relieve to that extent a class of men in the country necessary to its productive industry.

Mr. GRIMES. We are at length, Mr. President, in one of the very last days of the session, approaching the consideration of the most momentous subject that has been or that can be considered during this session of Congress. We are to determine to-night, or at any rate while we consider this bill, whether or not the treasure that has thus far been spent and the blood that has hitherto been spilled in this controversy are to be wasted and sunk into the ground, or whether they are to accomplish the purpose that the country desires; that is, the restoration of the Union. We are, in a word, to decide whether or not we are to have an army, or whether we shall suffer the forces that are now in the field to be frittered away, to be devastated by war, and nothing be substituted in the place of the men now standing in the ranks.

Mr. President, the bill now under consideration as it came to us from the House of Representatives is a most extraordinary one. I confess that I never was called upon to pass a judgment upon a bill that so much surprised and perplexed me. It would be exceedingly difficult for me to determine in whose interest the bill was designed to be passed into a law. In my conviction, if enacted into a law as it was presented upon our tables, I agree perfectly with the Senator from Missouri there would not be a single white soldier added to our Army under it, and probably very few colored soldiers.

I need not say that I have always been opposed to commutation for military service. I have believed that every citizen of the country owed his property, his service, and his life to the country if it was necessary, and I have always therefore steadily voted against commutation. The Senate passed a bill that was tolerably acceptable, I believe, to those who have entertained the views that I have entertained on that subject, and sent it to the House of Representatives. It has come back in the shape in which it now stands upon our table; and one of the provisions which now is under consideration the Senator says is recommended to us from the fact that it was proposed by a member, I believe, from a slave State and adopted at his instance. If that be so, the whole bill is commended to us upon the same consideration, for I understand that the whole bill was drafted by him.

Now, what was the bill as it stood when we commenced acting on it? It declared that any person who might be drafted under its provisions might furnish a substitute; that that substitute should, if he were enlisted for one year, be paid $200 bounty, for two years $400 bounty. The third section, that being the section now under consideration, allowed recruiting from the rebel States of colored men. I suppose that if the man who was drafted in the State of Massachusetts or Iowa could go to Louisiana or Mississippi and find the man who claimed the title to a colored man there, he could get a fee simple title to him for fifty dollars. All then that would be necessary for him to do under the provisions of this bill, which is thus commended to us as having been drawn by a gentleman from a slave State, would be to enlist this man to the service, the title to whom he had secured for fifty dollars, draw his $400, and make $350 by the operation. That is the bill which is commended to us as having been drawn by a member of Congress from a slave State!

I do not propose to enter into a criticism at this time of various other sections of the bill other than the third section now under consideration. This section as it now stands authorizes the Executives of the several States to send recruiting agents into the States in rebellion, there to recruit colored men with which to fill up the quotas of their own States. I object to that. In the first place, I believe it is an inhuman provision. I do not doubt that by some State Executives it may be properly exercised; but are not the transactions last autumn in the city of New York fresh in the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs? Do not you remember that it was impossible for a gentleman to send his butter to the market, and that man not be captured, and the first thing that the master would know of his servant he would find him with a uniform on at Riker's island? Are you willing that Mr. Seymour, or some of the other Governors of States, shall send their emigrant-runners down into Mississippi, and that there upon common ground, within the lines of your armies, there shall be a cloud of emigrant-runners, of these recruiting officers, each contesting and appealing against the other attempting to secure recruits to fill up your quota? How will it affect your quartermaster's department? How will it affect the men in your commissary department? Do you suppose it will be possible for you to secure laborers? It is complained constantly that we are not recruiting as many colored men into the ranks of the Army as we ought. I am told by those familiar with the subject that we have a very considerable army. I think the Senator from Massachusetts said we had one hundred and fifty thousand of them the other day.

Mr. WILSON. That was a misunderstanding, I think. I said I thought we had one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty thousand in the employment of the United States, about eighty or ninety thousand of them being soldiers, and the rest laborers in the quartermaster's department and commissary department. We have a great number there, but less than we want. I was told by the Secretary of War the other day that he would be glad to get forty thousand of these men as laborers.

Mr. GRIMES. That was just the point I was going to come at. I am told by officers of the Army who are familiar with the subject that there are as many men in the employment of the medical department, of the quartermaster and commissary and ordnance departments of the Army as there are enrolled in the regiments; that there are somewhere in the neighborhood of ninety thousand men thus enrolled; and that there is not more than half enough to supply the demand for laborers in these various departments. Now, would it be wise, I ask Senators, to allow the Governor from my State, from Ohio, and from the various other States to send their agents down within the lines of the Army and there, without any restrictions—for this section does not even declare that this recruiting shall be done under the superintendence or in accordance with the rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of War; the power is put completely in the hands of the Governors; there is no power reserved anywhere to regulate the manner and the terms on which this recruitment shall be made—will it then, I say, be discreet and wise for us to authorize the Governors of these States to go down within the lines of your Army, and there to use all the blandishments, all the threats, all the oppressions that these agents choose to use in order to procure recruits to fill up the quotas of the respective States? It occurs to me that a more wild and suicidal, and I would say ridiculous scheme could not be devised. I trust that it is hardly necessary for me to pursue the subject further. I judge from the countenances of Senators around me that all are prepared to vote for striking out this section, or else to vote for the substitute proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I wish to say in a word that I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. There have been many important considerations urged in its favor, and I shall not recapitulate them. There is, however, one consideration that presses itself upon my mind, and that is the national honor. I believe there is such a thing yet left as the national honor. The purpose of this section, if I understand it, or at least the effect of it, will be to fill up our armies in the time to come entirely, or almost entirely, with black men, and to enable the white men of the North to remain at home in the pursuit of their ordinary business, some to devote themselves to their merchandise, others who may have bought yokes of oxen to work them, and others to marry wives, and all to grow rich by the increase of prices under the necessity of the times. Why, sir, under the circumstances growing out of this war and the increase of prices, there is scarcely a man in business, in agriculture, merchandise, or pursuing any of the industrial active pursuits of life, who in one week, if not in one day, cannot make money enough to purchase some half dozen of these substitutes, or to furnish means to acquire half a dozen of these substitutes.

I will not say, as the Senator from Missouri has said, that this will be likely to lead to kidnapping, but I fear it will lead to the enactment of the ancient disgraceful scenes over the auction block, which have brought infamy and disgrace on this country abroad. I fear if the loyal, patriotic white men of this country are to be left at home in the pursuit of their lawful money-making business and the battle is to be finally fought by colored men exclusively, that battle which we expected to have been won will be lost and our credit and our character sullied forever.

That, sir, is one of the reasons why I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, national honor being involved in this question, and shall oppose the third section of this bill as proposed by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, before there is further discussion I desire to state a little of the history by which this bill has been thrust in its present state upon the Senate. I cannot sit in my seat here, as one of the Military Committee, and be charged with having given my consent to its being presented in the form in which you find it. If I understand it correctly, at any rate so far as my information goes, this bill was taken up this morning in that committee, and received but a slight attention. There was an earnest dissent from almost all its provisions expressed, I think, by almost every member of that committee, but by the courtesy of the committee it was permitted to lie over and to go to the authorities, and there receive some investigation, with the understanding that it was, to-morrow, to be discussed by the committee. This afternoon a very few of the members of the committee were taken together, and amendment proposed to it putting it in its present shape, and here we have it before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a word. I am surprised at such a remark as that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it is out of order to refer to the proceedings of a committee.

Mr. WILSON. Not only is it out of order, but it is not true.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I beg the Senator's pardon if I am out of order, or if it is not true.

Mr. WILSON. It is not true nor just.

Mr. SPRAGUE. But, sir, here is one of the most important measures coming before the Senate stamped with the approval of the Military Committee, by a majority of them, when if I am correctly informed it does not come with their assent. It may come with their tacit assent. I have no doubt the chairman of the committee feels that he has their assent, and felt it when the question was presented. I have no doubt of that. But, sir, when a measure so important as this to the interests of the country, so important to the interests of the military service and to the cause, comes before the Senate, and the members of that committee receive the strictures by which Senators have met the bill, I cannot rest in my seat without at any rate suggesting to the Senate the manner in which it has been presented.

Mr. WILSON. I am rather surprised at the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island. I dare say the Senator wishes to put himself right and to do injustice to no other member of the committee, but he has certainly done so in the remarks that he has made. I know that it is hardly proper to speak of what took place in the committee. I will say, however, that the bill came up and no vote whatever was taken upon it and no expression of opinion that would indicate precisely how the committee would vote, if a vote did take place. There were Senators who expressed themselves against it, others expressed themselves against it unless amendments were made. It was thought best that this bill, so important to the country, should have a careful examination, and that the War Department should see the bill, and we should hear any suggestions that might be properly made from the Department. I left my place in the Senate to-day, which I very seldom do, because I was pressed up from all quarters; everybody said we must act on this measure at the earliest moment; and I went to the War Department, and my name stands upon the record as being absent on a vote to-day, and that is a thing that rarely takes place in the Senate. I read the bill to persons whom I knew understood something about this matter; the points were discussed over; and I marked them down. I came back to the Senate and proposed to members to hold a meeting of the committee this evening at six o'clock in order to pass upon it so as to bring it in this evening. It was suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] that we had better act promptly and hold a meeting then. I looked about the Senate. The Senator from Rhode Island was not present; but the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from New York, and myself held a consultation in the committee upon this bill, all who were present or could be found about the Capitol, and the amendments that have been proposed to-night were the result; and I think everybody will admit that they were generally improvements, for they have been generally sustained.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose the Senator does not mean to imply that I assented to the bill?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; but I say a majority of the committee reported these amendments, and the Senator concurred in the amendment, but said he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from New York, the Senator from Indiana, and myself reported in favor of the bill, being a majority of the committee present. If the Senator from Rhode Island had been present at the meeting, and I am sure I should have been glad to have every member of the committee present, the vote would have been the same and the bill would have been reported. There was no effort made by any member of the committee to take a snap judgment, but an honest desire to get the best measure we could, and to consult those who would have the administration of it to some little extent, and to get the matter at the earliest moment before the Senate on account of the pressure of business.

Mr. CONNESS. It is hardly in accordance with the rule adopted this evening—a very good one—by the Chair to discuss all these questions, and thus keep us until twelve o'clock before we can come to a vote. I should like to make a speech, but I cannot afford it, and do not think the Senate can afford it.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate more than a very few minutes. I wish very briefly, as I intend to vote against the third section of this bill, to assign my reasons for it.

I do not think there could be introduced into the laws governing the military service of the country a section more disastrous to the service than the one under consideration. I very fully concur with Senators who have spoken against that section. The section authorizes the Executive of any State in the Union to send agents into any or all the States declared by proclamation of the President to be in rebellion, and there to recruit from white persons or black persons men enough to fill their quota. In my judgment it is manifestly wrong to allow any State in the Union to go into the rebellious districts for the purpose of filling its quota. There is but one equitable and just mode in which this thing should be done. Each and every adhering State in the Union should be required to fill the quota allotted to it out of its own population. If you pass this section the result will be that the men of the western States, most of whom have filled their quotas heretofore by volunteering, where no draft has been executed, that are rich in men and patriotism, but not so rich in money as other older States of the Union, will be fighting the battles of the country alongside of negroes that are purchased by recruiting officers from the rich, wealthy northern States, from the cotton, sugar, and rice plantations of the Carolinas, and Louisiana, and Mississippi. That is not right.

If we go into the rebellious States for the purpose of enlisting men in the Army they should be credited to the United States and to no particular State. It would be manifestly unjust that they should be credited to any one State, for the reason that many of the western and northwestern States have not got the money, even if they chose to do it, to go down into that region of country and buy men by giving high bounties to take the place of their own citizens. It would be highly demoralizing, as has been fully stated by the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from New Jersey, and the Senator from Missouri.

The true and equitable principle, and the only one that should obtain is, that on each call that is made upon the people of the State, when a proper and just allotment is made, each State should furnish its number from the people that are resident within that State. Massachusetts, New York, or Connecticut should not be allowed to go into any other State of the Union for the purpose of filling up their quotas. The people of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kentucky, Illinois, or Indiana should not be allowed to go beyond their borders to recruit soldiers to fill their quotas. Each State out of its own population should fill its quota. That is the only equitable mode in which the burdens of this war can be equally distributed among the people. Then, if you go outside, in these rebellious districts, to recruit one hundred thousand or ten thousand or one thousand or any other number of men, when you come to make the next call you will want many less men, and consequently the draft will fall lighter upon every State. If you obtain one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand men in the rebellious districts, when you come to make your next call on the States you will want that many less men from the States. Credit that two hundred thousand or whatever the number may be that you enlist in the rebellious States, and then make your call upon the States for the balance that you need, and then it will fall upon each State equally and equitably. There can be no doubt that there is no equity in this proposition.

But, sir, if you allow the States that have great wealth to send their enlisting officers and their ten thousand agencies into the rebellious States for the purpose of enlisting those persons you will find that every description of fraud and wrong will be committed. You will by that means not only get inferior soldiers, but there will be very great prostitution in procuring them. We all know the kind of villainous frauds that have been committed in the city of New York lately by this description of agents. They seized men, drugged them, made them drunk, and took them to the recruiting stations for the sake of procuring high bounties. Some of them were utterly unfit for the military service. I saw it stated in the journals of that city that gray-headed men had their hair dyed or painted to give them a youthful appearance, and they were taken into the service and the bounties paid, and they would be utterly worthless as soldiers. In my opinion, the same sort of practices will be carried on under the third section of this bill.

Sir, I do not believe that the negroes you will obtain from the cotton, rice, and sugar plantations of the South will be as good soldiers as the white men of the North, the South, the East, or the West. I am utterly opposed to a policy that will allow a few of the wealthier States, in consequence of their having money, to go there and put that description of population into the Army for the purpose of filling up their quotas, when the brave gallant West will have to give their own sons to the strife. Sir, it is not right. If you do that you will have an Army that will be worthless. If I wanted to aid this rebellion I would vote for that section, for by it you will get a worthless Army. Who believes that these poor degraded negroes would make soldiers equal to the white men of New York, Massachusetts, Indiana, or Illinois? No man believes it.

It will be seen that if you adopt this section, and these States go down there with their money bags to buy these people into the ranks in order to take their own population out of the strife, you will make the burdens fall harder upon those States that fill their quotas by giving to the Army their own children. Some of the rich States of the North, instead of having their own sons in the ranks, will have them filled up by these miserable negroes, and they will be brought to fight alongside of the gallant men of Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kentucky, and other western States. You may rest assured that the regiments coming from those rebellious States would never be put in the front. They have always been kept back. A good general never puts a worthless soldier in the front when the enterprise is hazardous and desperate. No, sir; the whole burdens of this strife will fall upon the flower of the western youth. It will be so with the States of Pennsylvania and New York and those States that send their children into this war; they will be slaughtered, while the sons of other States, who fill their quotas with hired substitutes and miserable negroes, will not be in the strife at all.

Sir, it is a monstrous proposition. It is one calculated not only to weaken the Army and destroy the efficiency of the military service, but it is unequal, iniquitous, and unjust to the States. In no aspect of the case can I be induced to vote for any such proposition. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate. I know it is getting late, and I desire a vote on this question.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, it is some time since that I became somewhat sick of the discussion involving the subject-matter now in controversy. I cannot please myself with the pleasant reflection that perchance I might be able by such remarks as I might address to this Senate to maintain any conclusion, no matter how clearly in my own mind's eye that conclusion was justified by the strictest rules of right or the severest rules of logic. But, sir, as I have an office here I am not willing that grave matters shall be gravely disposed of as it is supposed they will be in a grave Senate, unless, when I think them utterly wrong, they have at least the protest of my voice.

Mr. President, power is exercised in multitudinous forms. Power is often expressed by the term tyranny, where it is unjustly and wrongfully exercised by one or many as against the multitude. Probably the highest and most particular exercise of the power of the tyrant is where he closes the portals of the mouth, where he shuts the ivory gates through which man communicates with his fellow-man; where, without the aid of art, man mingling with his fellow-man, they learn from each other, and by mutual contact they become wiser and better and stronger. Perhaps the next exercise of tyranny is that when power is exercised to prevent the use of that great communication between man and man which art furnished to us in the fourteenth century and to which we claim ourselves to be indebted for our modern civilization—that we shall not print or write to each other. But of all tyranny that tyranny is the greatest, that tyranny is the most terrible, that tyranny is the most fearful, that tyranny which has more to do with trampling down men and nations than any other, is the tyranny of force asserted in the name of liberty; where that sacred name is invoked that it may command the sword; where that name is invoked that it may command legislation, and where it can control men in the name of liberty.

In the history of nations there has been nothing like such legislation as we have had and as is now proposed, this being part and parcel of the whole. In the name of liberty we are wielding a power to compel, subjugate, and destroy a race of men. What does this third section mean? And allow me to observe that I am opposed to the section and its amendment. In the name of liberty, it provides—

That it shall be lawful for the Executive of any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, who shall be credited to the State, and to the respective subdivisions thereof which may procure the enlistment.

What does that mean? The language might be considered ambiguous out in the timber; it might not be understood in the Caw nation; the Sioux might not understand it; there might be some doubt about it in the Territory of New Mexico; but no man here can dare to say that he misunderstands it. Translated into a more direct vernacular it means simply this: any State may send an agent into the States in rebellion and may engage the negro population, and put them under arms, and being placed under arms, that State shall be credited with them. That is a simple statement of the proposition, naked and bare, as it was designed, as it cannot be disguised; and the section does not even disguise it except as to how the matter shall be credited. In the name of liberty, then, by virtue of the power that we possess as legislators, the President as the Executive, the Commander-in-Chief of our armies, with generals, colonels, captains, lieutenants, and corporals, Ohio men, Massachusetts men, New Hampshire men, New York men, Pennsylvania men, Illinois men—I will not say California men because we have no occasion of the kind—are to go and find in the South negro laborers in the field to take the place of the men whose office it is to fight the great battle of the North. Those negro laborers are to be made the sacrifices. Is it true that upon us sins have so accumulated that we have to find some special subjects for sacrifice, that you are to make hecatombs of all the negro population of the South by withdrawing them from their present position and placing them in the front of battle to maintain the liberties won by our fathers in the noble fields of the Revolution?

Mr. President, I must say to you and to all Senators that this kind of legislation degrades the great North. A better, nobler, braver race of men never occupied a portion of the round world than the people of the free States of this Republic. They have upon a hundred battle-fields poured out their blood like water. They will do it to-morrow, when the drum sounds the call or the bugle its notes; they will do it to-morrow a month; they will do it to-morrow a year; for I am one of those who hold that the Union must be reestablished. I have always asserted and shall always try to maintain it. But I say we degrade the dignity of those men to whom belongs the business of war and battle by such a proposition as this. The proud pine trees of Maine will crouch their heads in shame, the tall trees that grace the green hills of Vermont will bend their heads to think that sons of theirs are not able in an honorable, manly, self-relying fight to maintain the integrity of the inheritance of their fathers.

This may be called mere declamation; this may be called valueless discourse. Underlying all this common talk are sentiments that belong to the great heart of the nation. I think I am somewhat akin to that great heart, and as it pulsates I think my heart pulsates. I think this proposition to bring, in place of the true men of battle, persons not legitimate to the field, to substitute for the men who are bound to conquer, if conquering we shall ever be, persons of whom we know nothing, men who have been servile all their lives, of a race foreign to our own, not intelligent, and whom we, in the name of liberty, have undertaken to maintain—such a proposition is as false as that for which Nathan, if I remember history correctly, rebuked David.

Do you propose to exterminate the black race? If that be the proposition, if that be the policy, let it be avowed. I can consider that there will be some philosophy in that; let it be avowed; but do not, in the name of liberty, indulge in a tyranny by bringing forward these people from whom you propose to strike the shackles that now enchain them, and putting them in the front of battle to fight out the great cause in which we are engaged, the suppression of the rebellion. Sir, I say it is absolute tyranny, and a tyranny exercised in the name of liberty. How false, O ye gods!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now submit the amendment of which I gave notice this morning. It is to insert the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of paying the bounties and of enforcing the draft provided for in this act, there be levied and collected, in addition to the duties imposed by law, a special duty of ten per cent. on all incomes exceeding $600, accruing during the year 1864, which duty shall be assessed and collected in the mode and according to the provisions, penalties, and restrictions provided in the act approved —, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes." And this duty shall be payable on the 1st day of October next, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as to the time and mode of assessment as will secure the collection of this special tax.

Mr. President, I regret as much as any man can the necessity of proposing so large a tax upon our people as this amendment now proposes; but I do think that the first section of this bill proposing a new system of bounties, in the present state of our finances, is mere madness. I cannot characterize it by any word less marked or less distinct. The idea of proposing to raise troops at this period of the war by a system of bounties ranging from two hundred to four hundred dollars, when gold is at 250, when loans cannot be had, without any provision for raising this money, is the wildest legislation I have ever known in any legislative or deliberative body. I cannot characterize the action of the House of Representatives in this respect in any milder language.

I have no objection to the system of bounties if we provide the money to pay them, but there is no money to pay them unless we provide additional taxes to meet them. I believe that nearly all our financial distress and trouble at this moment has arisen out of the system of bounties inaugurated at the beginning of the present session. We were able to raise and keep very large armies in the field by the aid of State, local, and city bounties. But when the Government of the United States, in addition to the expense of paying, arming, equipping, and clothing our soldiers undertook to pay these large bounties, it undertook more than it could accomplish. I offer this amendment with a serious determination to press it and make it a part of this bill.

I believe, even if we do not insist upon this large system of bounties, that an additional war tax will be a wise measure at the present time. It is a measure not novel. It has been adopted in many other countries. England has several times adopted a special war tax for one year only; and this is for one year only. The income tax raised during this year is three per cent. on incomes between $600 and $5,000, and I believe five and seven and a half per cent. on incomes above that amount. This amendment proposes to levy a special tax of ten per cent. on all incomes. It is a very severe tax; but I believe it is better for our people to pay this money than to embark in any more debt.

Besides, this tax will fall on a class of people who will not volunteer, and who, if drafted, will hire substitutes. The men who pay the tax on incomes exceeding $600 are the men who are able to pay taxes; they are the men who are not found in the ranks of our Army; or if they are found in the Army they are found in the condition of officers. The great body of our Army is made up of laboring men who have no fixed incomes, and therefore do not have to pay any portion of this tax. The tax will only fall on those who have accumulated property, and who therefore have the means to pay it. I believe it will equalize the burdens of the war as well as can be done in any other way.

If it were not for the difficulty of adjusting our system of duties on imported goods to meet it, I would propose an additional tax on manufactures; but a tax cannot be imposed on domestic manufactures without revising the tariff and making modifications which we are not now prepared to do, and there is no other immediate source of revenue out of which these bounties can be paid, unless it be from incomes. I do not know any other article that will bear an increased rate of taxation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the people of the United States can bear perhaps as heavy burdens as any people on the face of the globe; but there is a limit to their ability to pay. I speak now especially for the people that I, in connection with my able colleague, represent in this body. We are cut off for the present from a southern market, and have exceeding great difficulty in transporting our heavy and bulky productions to the eastern markets; and under the circumstances I would regard the proposed tax of the Senator from Ohio as exceedingly oppressive.

But, sir, I think there is a constitutional objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio which he cannot meet. The first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution provides:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

We cannot originate a revenue bill here. The bill under consideration is not a bill to raise revenue. It is a bill to amend the conscription law, a bill regulating the bringing of forces into the field, and not at all a revenue measure. Is it possible, when we have in this body a bill upon one subject coming from the House of Representatives, it is competent for us to tuck to that a revenue measure, a very important revenue measure indeed, a revenue measure that I had almost said was not equal upon the people? If this can be done, then may we very well and successfully evade the provision of the Constitution of the United States. It was intended by the framers of the Constitution that when the people are to be taxed that tax shall first be considered by their immediate Representatives, the men whom they elect, and that the Senate, elected by the Legislatures of the States, shall not originate a tax upon them. It seems to me the objection is conclusive against the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish the Senator from Ohio would withdraw his amendment until I could offer as a substitute for the bill now under consideration the bill which was adopted by the Senate a few days ago on the same subject. It will be observed that the House of Representatives did not choose to act upon the bill which we sent to them in regard to conscription, but adopted an independent proposition of their own, entirely ignoring the one which we sent to them, and thus we get no committee of conference, which I suppose they desire to avoid. I should like the question put fairly and squarely upon the bill which we sent to them; let them have an opportunity to vote for it or to vote against it; and then if there is a disagreement between the two Houses let those questions of disagreement go to a committee of conference. In this way we shall obviate this new question that is going to be thrust upon this bill of attempting to raise revenue with which to defray these bounties.

Before voting on the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, I should like to be able to cipher a little in regard to it. I should like in the first place to know how much this tax will raise if we adopt the proposition of the Senator. According to my recollection the amount that will be appropriated under this bill for three hundred thousand men would be $120,000,000. Does the Senator expect to get enough by the imposition of an income tax of ten per cent. to pay off these bounties amounting to $120,000,000? I apprehend not. Where is the balance of the money to come from?

Mr. SHERMAN. It shows the madness—I cannot use any other word—of the House of Representatives in this period of the session proposing to us to raise bounties amounting to more than a hundred million dollars. I do not know any way to meet that sum except by issuing more paper money, and thus more and more derange our financial system, or by levying taxes. I do not know any source of taxation except upon incomes now open to us.

I examined the point raised by the Senator from Indiana. I am satisfied the Senate have the power, under the power to propose amendments, to say they will not agree to the proposition to appropriate this money except by adding a special tax to meet it. Two or three cases of that kind have occurred already in our history. I am not prepared now to give the Senator the precedents; but I am informed it has been done in two or three cases. One case occurred during the Mexican war when a tax proposition was added to a loan bill. At any rate, this point can only be raised by the House of Representatives as against the Senate. There is no doubt that the Senate, under the power to amend, might insert any kind of an amendment on a House bill. The House might object to the amendment of the Senate, and might defeat it on the ground taken by the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the House agreed to our tax would it be a revenue bill originating in the House of Representatives?

Mr. SHERMAN. Then that point could not be made. It would be a tax by the two branches of the Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We have individually to meet the point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say it has been met already. It is true, we have no right to originate a bill raising revenue, but we have a right to propose amendments to any bill. This is a bill providing for the payment of a large sum of money, and I think we can add to that a mode of raising that money.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree fully with the Senator from Ohio as to the folly of the bill that comes to us from the House of Representatives at this stage of the session, after we have established our financial plans, after we have levied our tax and established our tariff, making an appropriation—for that is the effect of it—of $120,000,000. I think the only possible way in which we can extricate ourselves from the dilemma in which we are placed is to return them the bill which we have already sent to them as an amendment to their bill, and then we shall get to a conclusion. I do not see how we are going to get to a conclusion otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to adopt the proposition of the Senator if he will add the section I now offer as an amendment to it, and then have that before the committee of conference; so that if the House bill should be finally adopted we may have the tax also.

Mr. GRIMES. I am willing to do that, but it seems to me it is rather a large amount if we do not keep in these bounties.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator himself admits that it is not enough to raise the money to pay these bounties.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not suppose it will raise more than one third; but if we do not keep in the bounties, if we again determine here after mature deliberation that we will not pay these bounties, and that we will, in fact, have a conscription and a draft, which we ought to have had long ago, there will not be a necessity for raising quite so much, and five per cent., it seems to me, would be ample. It is a matter in which I have very little interest. I have no income. If the Senator will consent that my proposition shall be voted upon, I am satisfied that his proposition shall be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly compliant in a matter of that kind. I will withdraw the amendment for the present, and let the Senator from Iowa try the strength of his proposition if he chooses.

Mr. GRIMES. I now propose my amendment. It is unnecessary to read it. It is the Senate bill on this subject precisely as it passed the Senate before.

Mr. POMEROY. I think that is the best thing we can do.

Mr. WADE. So do I.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope that course will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I ask leave to offer an amendment as a substitute for the eighth section. It is to perfect that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole of the House bill has just been stricken out.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Then I will offer it as an additional section to the substitute which has been adopted. Senators will see the propriety of it on hearing it. It is to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all enlistments that have been made into the naval service or marine corps of the United States, since the passage of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863,'" approved February 24, 1864, and which shall hereafter be made into the naval service or marine corps, shall be allowed and credited to the appropriate township, precinct, or district, on account of which such enlistments have been or may be made, in the same manner as enlistments for the Army are allowed and credited to the several townships, precincts, or districts.

Mr. GRIMES. I think this amendment is right. It only carries into effect one of the provisions of the enrollment law passed at the commencement of this session, and which, in consequence of some defective wording, has not been executed, and it only applies to the enlistments made into the service since the commencement of the present session of Congress.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It puts these enlistments in the marine corps and naval service exactly on the same footing as enlistments in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the purpose of sending my amendment to the House of Representatives, or to the committee of conference on this bill, I will again move the amendment that I offered a short time since, striking out "ten" and inserting "five," so as to impose a tax of five per cent. It will then read:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of paying the bounties and of enforcing the draft provided for in this act there be levied and collected, in addition to the duties imposed by law, a special duty of five per cent. on all incomes exceeding $500 accruing during the year 1864, which duty shall be assessed and collected in the mode and according to the provisions, penalties, and restrictions provided in the act approved —, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes." And this duty shall be payable on the 1st day of October next, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as to the time and mode of assessment as will secure the collection of this special tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Harris, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, and Riddle—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Sautsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a slight amendment in the substitute that has been adopted for the House bill. We have adopted an amendment to-night allowing the Department to draft for one hundred per cent. more than they desired. The substitute only allows them to draft fifty per cent. additional. I want to change that to one hundred per cent. in accordance with the vote already given by the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON. If there is no objection I will move to change the word "fifty" in the second section to "one hundred;" so that it will read:

And shall make a draft of the required number and one hundred per cent. in addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That no officers or persons engaged in the military service of the United States shall enlist, recruit, or muster into the military service of the United States any person in any State of the United States to fill the quota of any State in which the person so enlisted, recruited, or mustered into the service of the United States does not reside. Any recruiting or military officer who shall violate this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and shall be subject to such further punishment as a court-martial may direct.

The sole object of the amendment is to require these recruiting officers to recruit from their own people to fill their quotas. I know that recruiting officers have gone from some of the northern States into the West and there recruited the citizens of the West for the purpose of filling their quotas. They offered high bounties in the North. I remember that when Indiana had filled her quota by volunteering these persons appeared there from the North offering high bounties. They also appeared in the State of Illinois. The Governor arrested one or more of them and ordered them out of the State. Some of them have been in my State; and I dare say they have been in the States further west. This amendment but carries out the principle that each State must fill its quota from its own people. It only has reference to the quotas of the States. Of course it has nothing to do with enlisting for the regular Army. That they can do everywhere all over the country. The amendment is certainly proper. The latter portion of it imposes a penalty on those who violate it, that they shall be dismissed from the service and receive such further punishment as a court-martial may inflict.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that his amendment goes a little too far in one particular. It would not allow the enlistment of those persons who have not any particular residence in any State, and a good many such people have been obtained.

Mr. POWELL. I think not. That was not my intention.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose it was not his intention.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will suggest any modification that will cover those cases I will accept it with pleasure; but I do not think the amendment is liable to that objection. I suggest to the Senator, however, that the objection could be obviated by inserting the words "or any resident of any State." If a man is going about loose in the world you can take him anywhere. My only object is to protect the people of my State, of the West, and every State in the Union from the encroachments of high bounties from other States. I desire Kentucky in this war to furnish her full quota from her own people. I do not want her to go elsewhere, or other people to come there. I desire the amendment for our neighboring western States and for all the States.

Mr. ANTHONY. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, the State laws already afford sufficient protection against that.

Mr. POWELL. Not at all, sir. There are no State laws on the subject in many of the States.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is in the power of any State to pass laws to prevent recruiting for other States within their borders.

Mr. POWELL. But the Legislatures of many of the States are not in session. The Governor of Kentucky not long ago ordered one of these agents out of the State, and Governor Morton of Indiana and Governor Yates of Illinois have done the same thing; but still they go about there and try to buy up the people.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand it is in the power of any State to prevent the very thing which the Senator from Kentucky seeks to provide against by this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the Legislatures are not in session.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me it is useless for us to legislate to protect States when they have ample power to protect themselves.

Mr. POWELL. I will say to the Senator it is our duty to punish the officers of the Army of the United States who violate a State law, if there is one; and this amendment does that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Provided it is against the State law.

Mr. POWELL. No, sir; it punishes any person who does this; but in some States there are no laws against this recruiting.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I understand if it is convenient for the authorities of Kentucky to recruit within the State of Tennessee and the government of Tennessee is willing that they shall do it, they are prohibited from doing it by this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. It only applies to States not declared in rebellion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then if the authorities of Connecticut choose to recruit within the State of Rhode Island and the State of Rhode Island is willing they should do it, I understand this amendment prohibits them from doing it.

Mr. POWELL. I do not believe Rhode Island would be willing to allow any such thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well. Rhode Island will protect herself, and will not ask the General Government to do it.

Mr. POWELL. Has not Rhode Island sent out agents to recruit in other States?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not where she was forbidden by the laws of those States from doing it.

Mr. POWELL. Connecticut has, I know, sent agents to Indiana.

Mr. WILSON. To carry out the Senator's idea, suppose a citizen of Rhode Island goes into Connecticut and offers to enlist there, what then?

Mr. POWELL. My amendment will not affect him. It says he must be recruited in the State. It does not affect him at all if he goes into another State and offers to enlist.

Mr. BROWN. I believe the only object of offering this amendment is for the purpose of letting it go to the committee of conference that will undoubtedly be appointed upon this bill. It is not necessary to perfect it here. The committee will take it under advisement, and if they see fit to act upon it they can do so. Let us then add on this amendment if it is desirable and send it to the committee along with the bill. In that way we may get through with this thing and be done with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foster in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky propose to modify his amendment?

Mr. POWELL. I will let it stand as I offered it, and adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, and let it go to the committee of conference.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. I second the hope of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I am very clearly of the opinion that our work to-night will come to nothing. I believe, after the many votes that have been taken in the House of Representatives, that the amendment that has been put upon this bill will not be agreed to. I think we have thrown away our time this evening for nothing. There seems to be a strong disposition here, however, to make these amendments; they are on the bill. In my judgment the House of Representatives will not concur in them; but still the amendments are on the bill; it will not do for us to kill it here; we shall have to pass it, and let it go to the House of Representatives.

The bill was passed.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 527) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate to the said bill; and,

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendment of the House to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate thereto, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. COWAN, and Mr. RAMSEY.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill of the House (No. 411) to encourage immigration, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and,

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. LANE of Kansas.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the joint resolution of the House (No. 11) in relation to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and,

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WADE, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. CARLILE.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 16th of last month, requesting information in regard to the maltreatment of passengers and seamen on board ships plying between New York and Aspinwall, a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by Mr. CONNESS that it be printed was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 560) to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preëmption to certain purchasers on the Socol Ranch in the State of California"—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 517) to incorporate the National Insurance Company of Washington—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a joint resolution (S. No. 75) declaring what States of the Union are entitled to vote at the approaching presidential election; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO A SENATOR.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] be excused from further attendance in the Senate during this session after to-morrow, owing to the condition of his health.

Leave was granted.

RANCHO LAGUNA DE SANTOS CALLE.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senate to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 559, reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so that we can make some reports.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a while. It is of very great importance to the people of California that the bill indicated by the Senator from Kansas should be passed at once. It is a House bill; the delegation from the State are agreed upon it, and the Committee on Public Lands have unanimously reported it. It will not occupy a moment of time.

Mr. WILSON. I will not press my motion for the present.

The motion of Mr. POMEROY was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 559,) to quiet the titles to lands within the Rancho Laguna de Santos Calle, in the State of California.

It provides that it shall be lawful for all purchasers from the grantees or their assigns of lands within the Rancho Laguna de Santos Calle, in the State of California, to file, within twelve months from its passage, with the register of the land office at Maysville, applications describing the lands so purchased by them respectively, with proofs of bona fide purchase from the grantees or their assigns; and, upon such proofs being found satisfactory, the purchasers are to be permitted to enter, according to the lines of the public surveys, at $1 25 per acre, the lands so purchased within the limits of the rancho, as described in the petition presented to the board of commissioners under the act of March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," to the extent to which the lands so purchased have been reduced to possession, and are now held by them; but any person who shall avail himself of the provisions of this act is to be thereafter debarred any further claim under the grantee in the event of a final confirmation of the grant.

Where any additional surveys may be found necessary to give full effect to this act, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to cause such surveys to be made at the cost of the purchasers, as provided by the tenth section of the act of May 30, 1862, entitled "An act to reduce the expenses of the survey and sale of the public lands of the United States;" but no entry of mineral lands or lands reserved for military or other public uses is to be permitted under this act, nor are any rights acquired under the preëmption laws of the United States to be affected by it.

It is to be the duty of the register and receiver of the proper land office to receive all applications in cases presented under this act, pursuant to such instructions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to adjudge all such cases as preliminary to a final decision in due course of law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is that bill reported from any committee?

Mr. McDUGALL. Yes, sir; it is reported by the Committee on Public Lands, who examined it very carefully.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON. I renew the motion for an executive session.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion with reference to the Committee on Enrolled Bills. I desire to have a member appointed on that committee, if he will allow that to be done.

Mr. WILSON. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose it can only be done by unanimous consent in any event. One of the members of that committee is disabled from rendering any service by reason of an accident which has befallen him, and now the business of the committee is getting very laborious as the session draws to a close, and it is essential that another member should be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An additional member may be appointed by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the Chair will appoint the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I must now insist on my motion for an executive session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he contemplates doing anything more than making reports in executive session.

Mr. WILSON. That is all.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock in.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

VOTES RECORDED.

On motion of Mr. BROOMALL, leave was granted him to record his vote in the negative on the amendment of the Senate to the tariff bill reducing the duty on railroad iron, and in the affirmative on the passage of the same bill.

RANCHE LAGUNA DE SANTOS CALLE.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill to quiet the titles to lands within the Rancho Laguna de Santos Calle, in the State of California; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, the House took from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) in relation to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, with a Senate amendment, non-concurred in the same, and asked of the Senate a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. ALLEY, and Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH as such committee on the part of the House.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. COLE, of California, the House took from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 438) and the Senate amendments thereto to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, non-concurred in the said amendments, and requested of the Senate a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. STEVENS, Mr. COLE, and Mr. McCLURG as such committee on the part of the House.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS the House took from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 483) and the Senate amendments thereto, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route, non-concurred in the said amendments, and requested of the Senate a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. STEVENS, Mr. SWEAT, and Mr. DONNELLY as such committee on the part of the House.

ENCOURAGING IMMIGRATION.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the House took from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 411) and the Senate amendments thereto, to encourage immigration, non-concurred in the said amendments, and requested of the Senate a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. ENGLISH as such committee on the part of the House.

CONTESTED ELECTION IN MISSOURI.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, reported back the testimony taken in the contested-election case of Scott vs. Noell, and the same was ordered to be returned to Mr. Scott, the contestant, the case having been decided by the action of the House.

BIG TREE GROVE, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite Valley, and of the land embracing the Mariposa Big Tree Grove.

Mr. BROOKS. Where does this bill come from?

Mr. HIGBY. It is the Senate bill reported back by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROOKS. How much land is there granted by it?

Mr. HIGBY. Well, it is about a mile; it is a gorge in the mountains.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there any stipulation in the bill for the preservation of the trees?

Mr. HIGBY. There is.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot find such stipulation in the bill.

Mr. COLE, of California. The State will take good care of these big trees; the object of this bill is to prevent their being cut down or destroyed.

The bill was passed.

PRIZE CASES.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE SOSCOL RANCHE.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, reported a bill to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Soscol ranche in the State of California."

Mr. BROOKS. How many acres are there there subject to preemption?

Mr. SLOAN. The bill only authorizes certain purchasers of invalid Spanish claims to enter their lands. The whole amounts to about five thousand acres.

Mr. BROOKS. Has this bill been examined by the committee?

Mr. SLOAN. It has been fully examined and discussed before the committee.

The bill was passed.

NATIONAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 57, to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington; which received its several readings, and was passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF REBELS.

Mr. COLE, of California, asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 30th day of May, 1864, by resolutions of this House were, among other things, instructed to make inquiry whether any disloyal persons are employed as clerks in any of the Departments of the Government, and if so, who are responsible for such employment;

Resolved, That said committee be further instructed to inquire whether or not persons lately in the rebel army, or disloyal to the Government, are employed in any capacity under the Government, or hold places of trust and profit and draw pay from the United States; and that the committee be authorized to sit during the recess.

Mr. MALLORY objected.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections in reference to the appointment of General Blair. I ask that they be read, and upon them I demand the previous question.

The resolutions were read, and are as follows:

Resolved, That Robert C. Schenck having resigned the office of major general of volunteers, which he then held, on the 13th day of November, 1863, which resignation was accepted November 21, 1863, to take effect December 5, 1863, was not, by reason of having held such office, disqualified from holding a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, whose first session commenced on the 7th day of December, 1863.

Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., by continuing to hold the office of major general of volunteers, to which he was appointed November 29, 1862, and to discharge the duties thereof till January 1, 1864, the date of his resignation, did thereby decline and disqualify himself to hold the office of Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the first session of which commenced on the first Monday in December, 1863.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAJO INDIAN CAPTIVES.

Mr. PEREA. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee on Indian Affairs be allowed to report back a Senate bill in which the Territory of New Mexico is interested particularly.

There was no objection.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 226, to aid in the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives upon a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico, with the recommendation that it do pass. The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION FROM REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up House joint resolution No. 108, in relation to representation from States which have been declared by proclamation in rebellion, reported by me from the Committee of Elections.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission consisting of three persons, residents of States not involved in the present rebellion, whose duty it shall be during the recess of the present Congress to visit those States declared by proclamation of the President to have been in rebellion, and which have already, or may before the next session of the present Congress take measures to reestablish or reorganize State governments; and, after careful examination and hearing of testimony, report to the President for the information of Congress at as early a day in the next session as possible all such evidence as they may be able to obtain upon the question whether the loyal people in any such State have succeeded in reestablishing a State government, to what extent such State government represents and has the support of the loyal people in such State, and what is the ability of such people therein to maintain the same against domestic violence.

And be it further resolved, That until Congress shall be satisfied, upon evidence submitted to them, that the rebellion has been so far suppressed in any such State that there has been established therein a State government, republican in form and prohibiting the existence of slavery in the same, and so firmly established as to be able to maintain itself against domestic violence, representation from any such State ought not to be admitted into either branch of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no desire to occupy the attention of the House for a single moment on the pending joint resolution. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] has a substitute for the joint resolution, and when that is submitted I propose to call the previous question on the whole subject.

I wish to state that the gentlemen from Arkansas are desirous of asking the indulgence of the House that one of their number may be heard for some fifteen minutes in behalf of their people. This resolution is in such form that they will not be permitted to be heard, and I offer this resolution so that they may be heard:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to report forthwith upon the credentials of certain gentlemen claiming to be Representatives from the State of Arkansas.

I must have the unanimous consent of the House to consider these resolutions together.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I wish to submit some remarks to the House on my substitute. I will not take up much time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts one question. Is this to be accompanied by a resolution to give these gentlemen from Arkansas more pay and mileage than are received by members of Congress?

Mr. DAWES. That is an ungracious question to put to the Committee of Elections, which has never reported one of the resolutions of that character. They have come from other gentlemen. Of course the gentleman from Wisconsin will not be precluded by any motion I will make. I do not wish to be heard unless remarks be made which may require it. I want the House to allow these gentlemen from Arkansas to be heard for fifteen or twenty minutes in behalf of their people. That is all I ask.

Mr. COX. I object to their being heard.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin to offer his substitute. I regret that the gentleman from Ohio has not had patience to hear these gentlemen from Arkansas.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to hear these gentlemen from Arkansas, as I see no reason in hearing them unless action be taken; and I do not believe the House or the country is ready for the question before us. I understand that this resolution is to pave the way for the admission of these gentlemen.

Mr. DAWES. The object of the resolution is simply to obtain reliable information for the House at the next session, so that the House may have some foundation upon which to act. All the facts that we have in reference to Arkansas have been obtained from the gentlemen presenting themselves for seats upon this floor. We do not say that credence should not be given to what they say, but under the circumstances attending such a case the Committee of Elections do not think that the whole action of the House on such an important subject should depend entirely upon the verbal statements of these gentlemen, however high may be their character. It appears to the committee that such grave circumstances as those which surround the State of Arkansas and those which are like it, justify this course of proceeding for the appointment of an impartial commission to go down there and reproduce before both branches of Congress the real state of things for the information of the House.

Mr. COX. I desire to say that I do not make this objection from any factious spirit. It is a matter of grave concern to the House and to the country as to whether or not this state of Arkansas shall have even a quasi recognition—I mean this new State got up under auspices which I will not discuss. There is a fear upon the part of many members of the House that the State of Arkansas as at present organized may be used for some bad purpose at the next presidential election, and I submit to my friend from Massachusetts, who I do not think desires any such abuse of the electoral college, whether or not we do not now, without any commission being sent down there to inquire, know all about the condition of this bogus State proposed to be recognized here. I am, therefore, opposed to taking the first step for the recognition of this so-called State.

Mr. DAWES. Nothing can be done under the resolution I have proposed here that will contribute or can possibly contribute to anybody's design, either in creating or in preventing an electoral vote to that State. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that it is a matter of grave concernment to this House and to the country what course shall be taken with that State organization or with the old State organization.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to give way to me for a few minutes.

Mr. DAWES. I stated to the gentleman that I would yield to him if he would be patient.

As near as I can understand the gentleman from Ohio, he is battling with one thing while I am asking another. I do not think he understands the measure before the House. Every member of this House should recognize the fact that there is a grave state of things existing in that State, and States situated like it, which requires at our hands some evidence here as a matter of record upon which we can act with that solemnity and gravity which become so grave a question. Every gentleman can vote for these resolutions. They commit no gentleman to any one theory. They postpone necessarily the question about the admission of those gentlemen from Arkansas as Representatives until a report comes in at the next session. They do not touch the great question as to the electoral college for two or three reasons: first, it was not within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Elections to report on that; and further, that was a matter which we were conscious would elicit great debate and difficulty here; and therefore it was the desire of the committee so to submit these resolutions as that every one would recognize just what the gentleman from Ohio has stated here, that there is such a state of things down there as leads us all to hesitate what course we should pursue. This is a measure by which it is hoped some new light will be cast upon the subject before the next session of Congress.

What I asked for a moment ago, and what the gentleman from Ohio objected to, is another thing. There are three gentlemen sent here from Arkansas. They have been here waiting the action of this House for several months. They recognize the fact that no definite action can be taken this session. All they ask is that they may speak in behalf of their people some fifteen or twenty minutes. That is all I ask, but if it is objected to of course I must pursue the original plan.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to express the hope that my friend from Ohio will withdraw the objection he has made. Now, sir, it is bad faith to reject the members from the State of Arkansas and other States who have been duly elected to seats upon this floor, and it does seem to me it is aggravating that injury to refuse to allow them to be heard upon this floor without reference to the condition of their States and constituents. I am sorry that the gentleman from Massachusetts did not offer such a resolution as would bring this House to a direct vote upon the question whether these States are to be regarded as States out of the Union.

I would like to know how many members there are upon this floor who are willing to recognize at this time the principle that the southern States constitute a foreign nation and are not a part of the United States. I want to know whether they are not still to be recognized as parts of this glorious Union of ours. The settlement of that question cannot be postponed much longer. It must be determined one way or the other. If it is the intention of this House to exclude the southern States from all representation upon this floor it will certainly save a great deal of time and trouble to determine that question now.

But, sir, I do hope that these gentlemen who are here from the State of Arkansas will at least be allowed to be heard before their claim is rejected and they are excluded from the House. I appeal to the gentlemen before me to give these claimants an opportunity of presenting their own case, and I hope the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be modified so as to accomplish at least that purpose. Unless the gentleman is extremely anxious to coincide with Jeff. Davis as to the position of the southern States, he will not decide without a hearing that all representation from these States shall be denied to them.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether the gentleman is talking in order or not, but I think he is extending his remarks a little beyond what common decency would suggest from a man coming from West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. I resume the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the gentleman will allow the member from Ohio to finish his remarks.

Mr. COX. The remarks I made comprehend about what I have to say.

Mr. DAWES. I resume the floor and decline to yield further.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no doubt—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I say I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio would be very glad ["Order!"] to exclude West Virginia from representation. ["Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from West Virginia and to the House that if gentlemen insist upon speaking after they have been decided to be out of order he will be compelled at this stage of the session to exercise the power which has been vested in him to enforce order.

Mr. COX. I hope the Chair will excuse the gentleman from West Virginia. He is evidently laboring under unusual excitement. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the Chair will direct the reporters for the Globe not to take down anything a member may utter while speaking in defiance of the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That was the rule adopted in the last Congress, but it has not before been suggested in this Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The rules permit the Chair to decide questions as they arise. I object to his telling the House how he is going to decide questions that have not arisen in the future.

The SPEAKER. The Chair responds to the gentleman frankly that he has the right to state his construction of the rules, and to notify gentlemen in advance, that no one can complain of partiality.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 532) to establish certain post roads; when the Speaker signed the same.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I now present the substitute reported by me on behalf of a minority of the Committee of Elections, and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Whereas by article six of the Constitution of the United States it and the laws made in pursuance thereof are declared to be the supreme law of the land, and every act of secession by any State is in direct violation of such supreme law: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the acts of secession by the Legislatures of the several States whose people are now in rebellion, are mere nullities, having no force or effect to change the relations either of the States themselves or of the people thereof toward the General Government, and that by such acts the people neither freed themselves from the penalties attaching by law to treason or lost any rights as citizens of the States and United States, except such as may follow upon conviction of crime; that the duty of the people of such States to send true and loyal men to Congress, and the right so to do, as consequent upon the duty, still remain by force of the Constitution, requiring no act of the President or Congress to confirm them; that no State can, under the Constitution, assent to the presence of armed rebels from other States within its borders, and that any act of the authorities of a State giving such assent is a nullity; that the entrance of such armed rebels of one State upon territory of another is an invasion, from which, by article four of the Constitution, the United States are bound to protect the invaded State; that this obligation of protection on the part of the United States is due to each citizen individually, as a consequence of his duty of allegiance, and continues so long as there is a single loyal citizen in a State oppressed by such invasion; that so long as the Constitution and laws of the United States cannot be enforced in any congressional district, on account of the presence of armed rebels, there can be no free election, and a person claiming a seat through an election under such circumstances should be rejected.

Sec. — And be it further resolved, That the Constitution, in article two, determines the qualifications of electors for Representatives, and that any order of the President or act of Congress changing such qualifications would be a usurpation or a nullity.

Sec. — And be it further resolved, That whenever, by pestilence, foreign invasion, or domestic conspiracy, the officers of a State required by its laws to conduct an election have been destroyed or carried off, the State does not thereby cease to exist, nor do its people forfeit their rights as citizens of the State or of the United States, but from the very necessity of the case, and by virtue of the power implicitly reserved to the people, they may, in a practicable and reasonable manner, supply the deficiency and hold an election, conducting it, however, as far as is possible, in conformity with the existing laws and constitution of the State; and that the duty of Congress in passing upon such an election, claimed to be held under such circumstances, is limited to ascertaining whether it was a fair expression of a majority of the people, and in the mode of conducting it departed from the general laws of the State only so far as was necessary to supply the deficiency of officers required to conduct the election.

Sec. — And be it further resolved, That the right of the claimants from Arkansas should be determined by the principles here enunciated; and if they shall satisfy this House that the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State held peaceful sway over their respective districts; that in those elections they departed in nothing from the constitution and existing laws of that State, save in supplying requisite officers, and that they received the vote of a majority in their respective districts, then they are entitled to seats, but not otherwise.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to offer that as a substitute for the joint resolution reported by me.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I do.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to allow me to offer an amendment, which I am sure three fourths of that side of the House will vote for.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I object.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. All the resolutions of the minority of the committee depend upon article six of the Constitution. That article provides that "The Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land," * * * "anything in the Constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

For the purpose of sustaining the views of the minority it is not necessary to discuss the question of the relative powers of the national and State governments, or whether, by the Constitution, the Federal authority was, in the language of John C. Calhoun and of many of his republican followers, "a compact" or a Government. It is enough that by "the compact" the Constitution and laws of the United States are supreme, notwithstanding State enactments. It follows by legal and logical deduction that every State enactment in violation of or destructive to this Constitution or compact, (I shall not quarrel about terms,) is void as in conflict with the supreme law of the land. It will be remembered that the supreme law is that which overrides and is superior to all other laws. The next proposition of the minority resolutions is a corollary from what I have stated. The acts of secession of the several southern States being in violation of the Constitution, or destructive to "the compact," are, as opposed to "the supreme law of the land," void. That a void act is in law no act is a proposition which hardly needs authority to sustain it. The learning of lawyers and the common sense of the public will equally assent to the doctrine. On that small middle class who have just law-learning enough to destroy their common sense I will not waste argument.

The next proposition of the resolutions is that these void acts of secession (being no acts in the law) neither change the status of the several States nor the relations of their citizens to the State and General Government. This also is a deduction from what has been previously stated. The conclusions from these various propositions are most important and entirely at variance with the resolutions reported by the majority. The acts of secession being void and the status of the States being preserved, each State remaining in the Union is entitled to its constitutional representation. No proclamation by the President, no recognition by Congress is necessary to restore that to the Union which never has departed from it.

Nor do any practical difficulties arise from this doctrine; on the contrary, practical difficulties are obviated. The individual who has engaged in rebellion cannot protect himself from the consequences of treason behind his allegiance to his State and its act of secession; the loyal citizen of a State who has been overpowered by the force of rebellion loses no rights from the inability of Government to protect him against the crimes of his fellow-citizens. There is no danger of crowding Congress with traitors, because the traitor would or should be at once arrested and held to answer for his past crimes; if the person accused, loyal in thought, had only yielded to the vis major of the rebellion, he will be acquitted; if guilty, he will be condemned. No really objectionable person would dare to offer himself as a representative; he would not thus challenge the hostility of a victorious Government.

The resolutions then refer to the duty of protection which Government owes to the citizen in return for his allegiance.

If it be a crime on the part of the citizen to plot treason against Government, it is a violation of duty on the part of Government to allow the disloyal to force the loyal into rebellion. We have the authority of the President of the United States, which, as known to all the members of this House, I need not quote, for the fact that the majority of the people of the southern States did not assent to the rebellion but were hurried into it by the fraud or force of leaders. This declaration, having the high sanction of the President, repeated by almost all the leading journals and politicians of the Republican party, and fortified by our own knowledge of the condition of the southern States, proves that the majority of those who, under the majority resolutions, are deprived of citizenship, driven out of the Union, and, as being a conquered race, subjected to the arbitrary will of Congress, are in fact more sinned against than sinning.

It is, however, in point of justice and law immaterial how extensive the loyal sentiment may be in those States; so long as there is one loyal man looking to us for relief and protection we are bound by the great charter which unites us to furnish him that protection.

The resolutions of the minority cite article four of the Constitution, by which the United States guaranty each State against invasion and domestic violence. As the last refers to an insurrection against State authority by persons within the State, it perhaps has no application here; but invasion is the entrance of an armed force from without upon the territory of the State. Against such violence we are bound to protect a State without an appeal to us for that purpose either from the State Executive or any one else. Therefore, because every assent given by State authority to the entrance of armed rebels upon its soil is void as violating the supreme law of the land, there is an invasion from which each citizen may claim protection whenever armed rebels from one State enter upon the territory of another.

For Government to take advantage of its wrong to strip citizens of their property and rights because it had failed to discharge its duty in protecting them, is an injustice which nothing save moral obliquity or the fanaticism of party could suggest.

Again, neither Congress nor the President has a right to prescribe the qualifications of voters in either of those States. The qualifications of voters for Representatives to Congress are determined by the Constitution, (article one, section two,) and therein declared to be the same as for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures.

As the status of the State remains unchanged by the rebellion, and its constitution and laws intact, you must look to them and ascertain what qualifications they prescribe for electors; and, by the provision of the United States Constitution referred to, to add to or take from them in the slightest degree would be usurpation.

I come to the next excuse for infractions of constitutional law referred to in the minority report. We are told that by the events of the war the officers necessary to conduct an election are removed, and therefore an interference of Congress is necessary. It might be sufficient to answer that such interference should be limited to obviating that necessity, and we could not under that pretext attack the local institutions of any State. But the General Government is one of delegated powers, having no reserved powers; and to obviate the difficulty referred to its provisions are as wise and exhibit as great forethought as in everything else touched upon by its great framers.

By article ten of the Amendments of the Constitution, "all powers not delegated to the United States, &c., are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Thus we have, by express enactment, a principle enunciated (which I should have acknowledged in the absence of such enactment) providing for the very difficulty before us. The question is, where, in case all the offices of a State are vacated by pestilence, war, or accident, or (as we might call this case) by illegal combination of all election officers to resign, is the reserved power of supplying the deficiency? My answer is that the above article denies it to the President and to Congress and recognizes it as in the "people." In the case of James II the English Parliament held that by levying war upon the Commons and by his flight to France he had vacated the throne; and we may well hold that officers of a State government who have levied war upon the United States have vacated or resigned their offices.

And I may suggest parenthetically that the same doctrine originated in the sturdy English idea of liberty, implying a resignation from gross abuse of official power, might well be applied to some of our national officers not engaged in the rebellion.

The people of a State have therefore the right, in case of a general resignation of their public servants, to supply their places. The liberties of the people cannot be lost nor they be converted to alien enemies by a conspiracy of State officers to resign.

So long as Arkansas is under rebel control there can be no election, because the people cannot freely act as loyal citizens. But whenever the rebel forces are driven away and the Constitution and laws of the United States have resumed their peaceful sway, the people may by virtue of their reserved rights supply the places of the resigned officers and thus set in motion the machinery of State government.

But in exercising this power reserved ex necessitate they must be strictly limited to meeting that contingency for which they have no law, that of filling the vacancies in the State offices.

In everything for which they have a law, in the time and manner of elections, in those forms with which they can comply, they must follow their existing laws. If they believe their constitution or laws to be wrong they must amend them in the same manner and with the same formalities as were before required.

The necessity for officers gives no power beyond that.

Applying this reasoning to the Arkansas case, we shall find the conclusion of the minority to be strictly justified. Arkansas is a State in the Union, with its constitution and laws unimpaired. Its public officers have engaged in treason, and therefore have in legal effect resigned. If in any congressional district the laws of the United States are again peaceably recognized, then the people of such district who under the constitution and laws of Arkansas were entitled to vote "for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature" are entitled in some practical mode (receiving the assent of a majority of themselves) to supply the deficient offices and select a Representative to this House. They cannot change their constitution, they cannot amend their laws, except in the mode provided in their constitution as heretofore recognized by the United States; nor can we impose any condition or restraint upon their exercise of this right.

It is most singular to find the majority of the committee (representing that party which is now making war upon southern men and denouncing them as traitors for claiming the power to go out of the Union) themselves recognizing in their report John C. Calhoun's doctrine of nullification and secession.

I am well aware that the honorable chairman of the committee, who in this has followed the ideas announced by the gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] and from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] would deny most warmly that he entertained such belief. But, skillfully as he has covered up his reasoning, we must hold him to the results announced. He declares that the people of Arkansas must frame a State government, republican in form and prohibiting slavery, before they can be represented here. He utterly ignores the State with its constitution and laws. Now, either the act of secession was valid or not; if valid, we are waging an aggressive war in violation of the Constitution; if not valid, it did not affect the status of the State, and its constitution and laws as heretofore recognized by Congress are in full vigor.

We find sustaining this absurd doctrine of secession, or State suicide, or nullification, or whatever else the fancy of its votaries choose to call it, an odd combination.

First come the peace men, who, believing in a fancied state of human perfection, in the free will of States and citizens, scorning the trammels of law and the use of preserving force, would have no bond of union, no force of government beyond the free will or caprice of any minority of the governed. Shrinking in horror from the bloody declarations of Republican members, from the oppression and cruelties of such false disciples of union as Butler, and from that fearful carnage made necessary by the disregard on the part of our rulers of constitutional obligations, they fly to a false interpretation of the State-rights doctrines as a means of escape from civil war. They deny any coercive power contained in the Constitution, and would make an assent to rebellion a condition of being regarded as true to the Constitution.

Next come a class of the Republicans who, either desirous of a permanent separation of the States in order to establish a northern confederacy, are seeking to drive the South to desperation, and force them to the fiercest resistance, or who are willing to put down the rebellion, but desire to do so not because rebellion is wrong, but because they hope to lay the rebellion and the Constitution in one common grave, and to establish on the ruins of our present glorious Government a consolidated despotism.

To these may be added fanatical anti-slavery men, who, looking only to the occasional cruelties practiced by slaveholders and to the real sin of the institution, hold the destruction of slavery to be an end which justifies every means, however false or foul, to accomplish it.

In this connection I hardly need to allude to those camp-followers, the shoddy contractors, office-holders, and politicians who, seeking plunder, are willing to change their opinions as frequently as the wind its direction, if they can only know whither popular madness tends.

There are, it is true, a few whom you cannot locate, too honest to be suspected of indirection, and too intelligent to be suspected of being dupes; their opinions are the freaks of mind you cannot account for.

I am pleased to believe that the majority who reported the secession resolutions were both honest and able. It is for them to account for their position.

Both the peace men who desire no war, and the advocates of despotism who would war as well against the Constitution as the South, agree that the Constitution gives no sufficient power to the General Government to suppress the rebellion.

The first say you cannot coerce a State or force it back into the Union, and therefore must abandon the war; the last say as you have not power under the Constitution you are by necessity justified in every violation of it. To the first I say that we do not propose to coerce a State; that a State remains unalterably in the Union, every act to get it out being void. We do not, therefore, propose to coerce it, but to put down by every necessary appliance an outbreak as well against the valid laws and constitution of the State as against the United States. We care not how extensive the rebellion, the force to suppress must be equal to the extent.

To the last I say that the Government can protect its officers in the execution of its laws, and can punish for treason. The President certainly has as much power to call forth an armed force in case of armed resistance to United States laws as a Governor as chief magistrate has as to State insurrections, or as a sheriff would have, or, if you would still further diminish the respectability of the power, as two justices of the peace would have under the laws of Wisconsin. This power was exercised in Boston by protecting Burns against rescue, in Pennsylvania in the whisky insurrection, and in Massachusetts during the Shay riots. It is a power not directed against States, but against people in insurrection. But it is not left to inference. In section eight of the Amendments of the Constitution, authority is given to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution the powers given. What so necessary for executing the powers of the General Government as the suppression of a rebellion? It goes further, however, and not only is the General Government able to protect itself, but by the provisions heretofore cited is bound to protect the State, both against domestic insurrection and foreign invasion.

Without infringing the Constitution you can find every power necessary to uphold the integrity of State and national governments.

But leaving the argument, so far as it depends upon the Constitution, I will meet the gentlemen of the other side upon their own ground of necessity. I insist that we should follow the Constitution in its true spirit, as I have explained it, for two reasons:

1. Because a departure from it in the manner proposed by the Republicans makes this a war of almost extermination, which, decided in our favor, leaves us in men exhausted and helpless.

2. Because, although you may conduct a defensive war with the patriotism of the people as your sole capital, to an offensive war public credit is absolutely necessary; and our credit is through blundering and mismanagement in a most critical condition.

The first reason I shall dispose of in a few words. The rebellious South contains a white population (without consulting the census or pretending to accuracy) of about seven millions. With all their faults they are of a material to make good soldiers. This is a body of men which (true to themselves) have never been subjugated. History furnishes no instance of the kind. Divided nations, effeminate nations have been conquered, but no seven millions of united and brave people ever submitted to such a fate.

We must therefore, in the moral of our cause, and in the objects which we propose, seek to make this an exception. We must weaken the moral power of our adversaries and divide their councils by our own fidelity to the Constitution, and the greater hopes of prosperity which their return to the Union holds out over even successful resistance. Men are frequently carried away by fanaticism or are temporarily blinded by their own passions, but in the long run they seek to advance their own interests. Even the Republican leaders may some time to their sorrow find this to be true, when returning reason shall come to their followers. But what motive of interest, of passion, or of prejudice to excite the southern mind against our cause has the dominant party left untried? You have destroyed our moral power by abandoning and scoffing at the Constitution, in whose name you first waged war. The quotation, "Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just," is often repeated and rarely believed. But the great interpreter of nature never uttered a truer sentiment. My own simplicity prefers to believe thus with the unlettered people rather than doubt with the Republican philosophers. To the master you have said, "We will free your slaves;" to the poor man you have said, "The odious and pampered rival of your labor, the foul and lazy reviler of your humble state shall not only be your equal, but we will exalt him far above you; we have charity for the blacks but none for the suffering white." And no feature of this war is more striking than the self-sacrificing zeal with which the non-slaveholding southern laborer fights for the rebellion. The interests and prejudices of the slave-owner yield to his domestic affection for the negro who has been reared with him, but no such tie softens the antipathy which exists between the white laborer and the black. In violation of that constitutional provision which requires indictment and trial before punishment for crime you have passed your confiscation laws. You have done more; in despite of that wholesome constitutional restraint upon victorious cupidity, which limits forfeiture to the guilty, you have attempted to plunder innocent children. It was not enough to say to the southerner, (whether a rebel or only yielding to the vis major of the rebellion;) "Your own means of support are gone," but you point him to his children, and say to him "You must fight or them, too, we will rob." You have passed laws giving to the negro the homestead from which you drive the wife and children of his white master. In short, you have hardened into iron the tender sinews of youth and lent fire to the chilled veins of age. The myriad graves of our brave northern soldiers which fill the soil of Virginia are monuments to your patriotism and wisdom.

If Jeff. Davis himself had controlled the action of this House on many of the most important bills of this session, he could hardly have made it more beneficial to himself.

Mr. DRIGGS. Do I understand the gentleman to say this Congress has not passed a single act that Jeff. Davis would not approve? Would he approve of our military laws?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I think Jeff. Davis would prefer the amendments you have passed this session to the military law to allowing the law to remain as it was before. I think Jeff. Davis understands how much power there is in infusing soul, heart, and spirit into an army. I think he understands the difference there is between an army made up of men who feel that they are fighting for their homes and their loved ones, their liberty, their country, and all they hold dear on earth, and of men who merely fight from compulsion.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman from Wisconsin will excuse me for interrupting him again. He seems to have a better understanding of Jeff. Davis's views than I pretend to. I desire again to inquire if I understand the gentleman to say that the amendment to the enrollment law which provides for an absolute draft, after sixty days, of men in sufficient numbers to put down the rebellion, is such a measure as Jeff. Davis will approve?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; I think it is the greatest folly of these acts of fanaticism, of all the acts of oppression which mere power has enabled gentlemen on the other side to pass for their own political destruction. Oh, it is strange that "Man, proud man!

Drest in a little brief authority,"

"Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep."

According to the statement of Senator WILSON, chairman of the Senate Military Committee, we have raised seven hundred thousand men within the past year. Every order that the President has made for men has been complied with. If he has not men enough it is his own fault for not having said so. The complete success of our system of raising troops is the wonder of the world. And still our brave and patriotic northern people are ready voluntarily to furnish more men and money. In Wisconsin we have not only filled our quota but have voluntarily given hundred-day men in addition, for whom we receive no credit on the next draft. Other western States have done the same thing. And, under the circumstances, for any one to say that we cannot trust to the free spirit and patriotism of the people, but under conscription laws must hunt them out from their homes as wild beasts from their lairs, and drag them into the fight as a brutal master does his unwilling dog, is a foul libel upon a brave and generous people; it is ingratitude for their past sacrifices.

Let me entreat you, in the name of our soldiers, in the name of sorrowing mothers and weeping children, in the great name of our country, an inheritance from our fathers, return to your allegiance to the Constitution. Allow the southern voters and soldiers to feel that even more than victory defeat is desirable, as it restores them to the protection of the American Constitution.

Thus far I should hardly do injustice to leaders of the Republican party by calling them recruiting sergeants for Jeff. Davis. I do not know about the truth of a current story as to an interview between our Secretary of State and Lord Lyons; but this is certain, that fatal bell has never rung without sending an additional regiment to the army of rebellion. The gates of our Republican bastille have never turned upon their hinges without giving new power to Lee. Let us remember that constitutions are not made for peace. Peace and prosperity do not subvert Governments, although they may corrupt the people and unfit them to maintain liberty. It is amid fierce popular passions and in civil war that constitutions are necessary. Then we have a test of the capacity of the people for self-government; then with Argus eyes we should watch the slightest infraction of the charter of our liberties.

But our financial policy has been, if possible, even more unfortunate than our military. I should describe it in two words, tax and squander. I know of scarcely anything that enters into the actual necessities of life which has not been subjected to the Government crucible, except perhaps air and water. And yet, notwithstanding this, so wasteful has been our policy, so unwise our interference with the laws of trade, that Government credit has gradually been on the wane, and during this session of Congress we have seen the premium on gold increase from fifty per cent. to over one hundred. By our own bank bill, so unfortunate and so wicked, we not only made war on State banks, State credit, and State taxation for the benefit of a few unworthy dealers in stocks and Government securities, but as the issue authorized was founded solely on Government credit, we gave away the interest on the $350,000,000 which might have been saved to the Treasury, and then with blind confidence in penal law, with that disposition eternally to legislate which is a curse to this country, we terrify the people with gold bills, as if we could frighten them into parting with rather than keeping their gold. It reminds me of that old king who tested the flattery of his followers that he was omnipotent by ordering the waves to recede.

When will politicians learn that the laws of nature and of trade will yield to neither king nor Congress?

But my object is not to find fault, but to convince, to show from our present financial condition the necessity of adopting those true maxims set forth in the minority report, of taking to our aid every moral support, and of making this a contest to vindicate outraged laws and not an offensive warfare of subjugation. There is a class whom I do not hope to convince, politicians who live on politics, who have patriotism on their lips but not in their hearts. The irrepressible patriot is a curious study; he sees the sore need of the Government and says, "Tax this western interest; loyal men in these times ought not to object to taxation; it is necessary to put money in the Treasury;" but, sotto voce, he adds, "Let me have this large contract;" his sympathies are with the great bleeding heart of humanity as represented by the African, but he thinks the stealings of his particular friend should be overlooked; he is the advocate of the writ of habeas corpus, but thinks its principles apply to quiet times, when it will seldom be needed; he is the friend of the soldier, and believes in giving him the right to vote as his officers shall command, but not in giving him fair pay; he is in favor of economy, but advocates every wild scheme of internal improvement which promises fat pickings from the public Treasury as the very means of saving the country. His advice to the people is as disinterested as that of honest Iago to Rodrigo:

"Put money in thy purse; follow these wars; defeat thy favor with an usurped beard; I say, put money in thy purse. It cannot be that Desdemona should long continue her love to the Moor; put money in thy purse; nor lie his to her; put but money in thy purse," &c.

But there is another class of earnest, honest, men whom I would reach; men who desiring the country's good, feel deeply both the wrong of slavery and the crime of rebellion; men who, swept along by the strength and depth of their own conviction, have unconsciously to themselves been instruments of their wily political associates. The undertaking, however, to convince such is difficult for in their own prejudices, in their strong desire to punish rebels all other objects are buried. And nowhere do our own desires and passions become so dangerous as when some fancied duty gives them in our own eyes the appearance of a virtue. In olden times religion waited at the stake, and converted horrible murder into a holy office; in these times a fancied humanity is endeavoring to convert this war for national integrity into a crusade of extermination and plunder against the South.

And this process of self-deception, too, accounts for Quaker persecution to which my friend from Ohio so often alludes in his assaults upon the old Puritans; but he will pardon me for saying that the old Puritans were men of destiny; to them belonged no whining sentimentalities; they came here to found an empire, and in attaining that end all obstacles were removed; before their iron tread the Indian race disappeared; they had no tears to shed as in accomplishing their commercial greatness their ships rescued the negro from the bloody altars of African idolatry and bore him to the milder fate of southern slavery. Individuals should be absolutely and in every case just; but in the creation of empires, as in the mighty processes of nature, evil must be commingled with the good. The hurricane which purifies the atmosphere, sweeps not the forest alone, but involves the hut which shelters the poor man and the waving grain which feeds his children; the lightning strikes the just and the unjust; and the mighty waves of old ocean, when lashed into fury to prevent stagnation, involve in one common destruction the navies of nations and the frail bark to which the mariner has been driven to relieve the necessities of life. Thus the old Puritans regarded the duty before them; and the Puritan women were worthy of the men. They did not deserve the sarcasm which Juvenal pronounced upon Roman women in the days of Rome's corruption; their shining eyes were never suffused with tears at the death of a sparrow; they belonged to no Barioboola-Gha society, but they were helpmates for the men; they aided in laying the foundation of empires. My friend from Ohio complains of the bigotry of the Puritans, but I will point him to churches not far from the harsh rock of Plymouth, established by sons who have apostatized from the faith of their fathers, in which the gentleman may learn how much more disgusting than the cant of religion is the cant of infidelity. But I apologize to the House for digressing so far from the resolution.

I am one of those who believe that this rebellion may be crushed out by force, and that we may meet all national liabilities necessarily arising from the war. But in order to accomplish this, there should be as much of wisdom, moderation, and economy in the measures of this House as of skill and bravery in the field. The financial task before us is no slight one. About $1,719,000,000 of indebtedness have, according to the report of the Treasurer, already been ascertained; $900,000,000 are a small estimate for debts and liabilities which have not yet assumed so definite a shape as to be extended on the books of the Treasury Department; so that we have now a debt of about $2,619,000,000, which, at six per cent., will make our interest $155,140,000 per annum upon our debts up to this time. Instead of six per cent., Government is paying over twelve, allowing for the difference between gold which it pays and the legal-tender notes. We can hardly hope that with the greatest success of our armies, and even if politicians will let them alone, we can finish the war without the expenditure of $1,000,000,000 more; so that at six per cent., in the happiest condition of things, we must pay an annual interest of $247,140,000. But revolutions rarely move backwards, and although that wasteful extravagance which now marks the Administration will doubtless, and must through mere necessity, be checked in the future, still, taking into consideration our largely increased Navy, the necessity for an Army of some magnitude, and the additional expenses arising from the numerous officers necessary to collect your additional internal revenue and import duties, $150,000,000 are a small estimate for future annual expenses; and therefore, including interest, those expenses cannot be less than $397,140,000. To this must be added still another item of no inconsiderable magnitude, but as to which I have not the data to make even a rough estimate. You cannot abandon the sick and wounded soldiers, and care for them must be an additional charge upon the Treasury; at least two hundred thousand wasted frames and broken arms and legs will be a monument to that party which at Chicago a few years ago inaugurated the era of free speech, free soil, and free press.

But even without this large item, it will be seen that $397,000,000 is the annual amount which the industrial interests of this country must give to the Government. I am not convinced even by the eloquence of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. STREBENS,] to which I listened early in the session, that we can pay that amount in any other way than by the labor of the country.

We all love to hug a pleasant delusion, and would gladly turn from the contemplation of opposing armies and bloody battle-fields in the South, and of dull figures and giant debts here, to the Arcadia of the past and the Utopia of dreaming philosophers. I listened with intense delight the other day to the honorable gentleman as he described in glowing language the fertile prairies of the West and rich mines of California and the Territories out of which these debts were to be paid. Under the magic of his voice, the charmed senses already began to behold the golden peaks of western mountains glitter in the sunlight, and to see the cloud-compelling god descend upon the quickening earth, like Jupiter upon Danaë, in a shower of gold, so that we would need only to gather her wealth from the lap of rich and beautiful nature. But unfortunately the gifts of the gods become valuable to man only under the touch of labor, and these golden visions are as baseless as fancy stocks in Wall street. The mines of the far West cannot be made directly available in payment of our debts; they require for their development too much skill, capital, and labor. The hardy miner must traverse a trackless wilderness, exposed to the inclemency of the weather and the hostility of man; and almost without shelter, frequently without food, he must toil on in his painful enterprise; he is fortunate, indeed, if the results in precious metal are more valuable than would be the result of like exertion either in the cultivation of fields or in the workshop of mechanics.

I have been informed by gentlemen of great intelligence from California, and their statement has been confirmed by my own limited experience, of persons who have gone from Wisconsin that while an occasional fortunate adventurer becomes rich among the mines, still, if you take the average of one thousand persons engaged in mining, they are not better paid than for like labor in other pursuits. Where, then, is the margin of profit of which Government may avail itself? Besides, for the discovery of mines, individual enterprise, stimulated by hope of gain, is necessary. Some percentage upon actual earnings Government may perhaps require; but the chief influence of these mines in diminishing the public debt will be indirect. As they are developed and vast sums, multiplied in effect by means of the paper currency system, go into circulation, the value of property will increase with the extension of the standard by which value is determined; and while the number of dollars which we owe will not be less, the burden and importance of it will be less by the increased value of that out of which it is to be paid. Much of the enormous increase of wealth in this country from 1850 to 1860, as shown by the tables, &c., is due to this cause, and is therefore only apparent and not real.

I have thus discussed this question, and endeavored to show that all those vast sums owing by Government are a charge upon the industrial interests of the country, in order to demonstrate the necessity of greater economy and of more caution in the creation of debts. If we, to encourage the spirit of wild speculation and cram the coffers of those already rich, give away the millions necessary for a war of extermination, to that extent we mortgage the bones and sinews of the laborers of the country out of whose sore earnings the debt must be paid; our action must be responded to by sorrowing hearts and aching limbs. Let no one suppose that because Government taxes and national wealth are not immediately paid by the hand of the laborer that they do not come from him. All large national debts are a system by which capital robs labor, a system which changes the natural relation of mutual dependence and strict alliance between them to the reverse, and places capital as a burden upon labor, like the old man of the mountain upon the shoulders of Sinbad the sailor, and we must get rid of the idea that the North is now prosperous and growing rich. It amounts only to this, that by resort to a strictly paper currency we have more than doubled the circulating medium, and with it the apparent value of property. Contractors are scattering their easily-won wealth of notes among the people; everybody has his pockets full of paper. Everybody is disposed to enjoy the new riches; workshops and farms are deserted, and there is a general rush for cars, hotels, and watering-places. Insolent vulgarity flaunts in brocades and jewels; upstart wealth, the fungus of a night, rolls in its chariot; railroad monopolies show increased earnings; the stock market is up and Wall street in a fever. But this is not real prosperity; it is as delusive as that bestowed by Mephistopheles and Faust upon the Kaiser, and fully as fatal to the best interests of the country.

In the mean time, in the far South, the work of destruction is going on. Our brave soldiers, the bone, the sinew, the life-blood of the country, are gradually wasting in battle or yielding to disease. Let me not be misunderstood. A divided country would be certain destruction; the rebellion must be suppressed at every cost of blood and treasure. Nor do I have any faith in peace propositions made directly to Jeff. Davis and his armed hordes; but I would inscribe upon every banner, so that all the world might see and know it, "the Constitution as it is," without an additional t crossed or i dotted. There is not a line in that Constitution which is not worth a whole generation of modern politicians. Then, sir, peace propositions should be read on a line of glittering bayonets, should be thundered forth from the cannon's mouth, and the cry of "Onward!" should be echoed from the whole North again united, and no politicians should again stay the course of our victorious armies or rescue the rebel capital from the hands of our generals. I recognize the principle that the relation of master to slave must yield to the higher relations of subject to Government, and that as our armies progress the shackles of slaves of disloyal masters should be broken and the slave become forever free. The advance of our armies should be stayed just where military opposition ceases. When, however, the battle has been won, and our erring brethren of the South are ready to return to their allegiance, we should have wisdom and generosity enough to make a conquest, (necessary to give value to victory, but more difficult than that over their armies,) a conquest of their reason and hearts. And especially, having assumed in vindication of the Constitution the highest power which man can assume from his Creator, that of taking human life, we should show by our own regard for that instrument that such assumption was not hypocrisy.

But the majority of those in power seem to have adopted the maxim that propositions from the other side looking to a restoration of Government and cessation of hostilities should not be received, and that this war should continue for the freedom of the slave and confiscation of southern property; or, in other words, it is to be a war of extermination so far as the war material of the rebellious States is concerned, because it is not to be supposed that they will submit to such terms so long as any one is left to fight. As the North has a majority, with the sacrifice of a like number of northern lives, it may succeed in the war even on this basis. What, then, will be the condition of the country? The fictitious prosperity will disappear and a prostration proportionate to the intensity of the stimulus under which it had before been, and to the tremendous efforts it has made, will extend over the whole country. It is idle to hope the reverse, as it is the universal law of nature; each man feels it in his own system as the effect of over-exertion. The soldiers on both sides are taken chiefly from the industrial classes, and constitute the very life of the nation; of these, according to the programme of these revolutionists, all belonging to the South and a like number from the North will have been sacrificed.

Where, then, will be the labor to cultivate your fields, supply your workshops, and keep in operation your factories? Who will pay the debt? A Government which hitherto has been known solely for the blessings of wealth and protection it has brought will then be known chiefly through the tax-gatherer. Discontent will follow taxation, jealousy between different sections and interests as to the proportion of the national burden each shall bear will follow discontent. Utterly exhausted in this terrible struggle, we shall be exposed alike to foreign and domestic foes. The Mormons have not forgotten their persecution either in Illinois or Missouri, nor have they forgotten the desire for separate sovereignty of which their conduct has given so many evidences. Quietly seated in his remote fastnesses, through whose mountain barriers not even streams can find an outlet, but sink into the earth, where a few thousand can defend themselves against a host, Brigham Young is watching the process of mutual destruction going on among us. He will not fail to seize the opportunity of national exhaustion.

The Pacific States, now so true and loyal, if cut off by Utah rebellion from overland communication with the East may begin to consider whether they receive more of taxation than protection; may they not look at the central Government, so changed from its Federal form as to be almost a consolidated one, a Government trebly inconvenient for States so remote from the center, and conclude that it was the Constitution and Government which our fathers so wisely framed to which they had given their hearts? And as you make new requisitions upon them may they not exclaim, in view of their changed relations to the central Government, Non hæc in fœdera veni. These evils I do not believe will arise; they may be absolutely avoided, but the way to avoid danger is not by closing our eyes to its existence, but by looking it boldly in the face and taking wise precautions against it. The first duty of Congress relates to national finances; the money and credit of Government should be considered a sacred trust for the immediate and pressing necessities of the whole nation; not a dollar should be drawn for any purpose not absolutely demanded by good faith in national exigencies. Taxation, which is just when the results are applied to objects of vital importance to the nation, becomes mere robbery when the moneys are thrown away upon local schemes or political favorites. Let us reject every proposition of the kind, and render lighter and less annoying the burden of taxation by showing that the whole nation is benefited by each dollar paid into the Treasury; that nothing is wasted. Our next duty is a similar one; we have tried our credit long enough; and it is time we should begin to pay. Every subject of taxation should pay its fair proportion; no one should attempt or be permitted to attempt to throw its obligations upon the shoulders of others. The members of Congress should consult together in the spirit of candor, justice, and moderation. Those efforts of sections to escape from sharing the national burdens, which have produced so much discontent, ought to be discountenanced, and all should be willing not only to demand justice but to do justice. In considering the amount of taxation which each branch of business can bear we ought also to consider the indirect advantages which it derives from our financial system; because no one should be permitted to speculate upon the miseries of the country. We should abandon the system inaugurated by this Congress of sacrificing in taxation the interests of the Treasury to building up local interests and advancing private speculations.

Above all, those animosities created by political ambition and love of office (always indicating an entire want of true patriotism) should disappear. Near the graves of the mighty dead, in the presence of a country which in its death-struggle and in its terrible agony is dropping blood from every pore, let the passions and clamor of parties be hushed.

Think of President-making during a nation's sorrow, while one half of the North is clothed in mourning, fathers lamenting the death of sons, children calling in vain for a father, sisters bending over a brother's grave, and mothers weeping for their children, and, like Rachel, refusing to be comforted, because they are not! Let us approach each subject pertaining to the safety of the country with the reverence of one treading on holy ground. This House is powerful for good or evil; its influence either to excite or allay the fierce and destructive spirit of faction goes forth to the country increased a thousand-fold through the mighty agencies of the press.

If in this House moderation and justice, union and harmony prevail, the effect will be felt in the most remote portions of the North; it will give new energy to enlistments and a new spirit to the Army; and while it will not subdue armed foes, it will secure to us the fruits of victory; it will not capture the rebel capital, but after our armies have taken that stronghold of rebellion it will make it the stronghold of loyalty. Under such an influence, aided by the valor of our troops, peace will again return to our land, the Constitution and law be triumphant over brute force, and the capacity of man for self-government be vindicated from those doubts which the circumstances of this war have thrown around it.

The huge debt which now overshadows us will be felt, it is true, as a punishment for past transgression, but its bulk will gradually be diminished before the skill of our artisans and the vigor of our laborers, aided by economy and prudence here. Then we may do something more than utter vain threats against the infringement by foreign Powers of the Monroe doctrine—we may make our threats good. The old dream of empire extending from the Arctic ocean to the Isthmus may return; and the armies of the Union may again plant our banner resplendent with stars upon the walls of Mexico, and this time not as conquerors, but deliverers.

"But," says the priest of Moloch who has intruded himself before the altar of God; "but," says each petty Robespierre, ambitious on American soil to introduce the bloody shambles of revolutionary France; "but," echoes each driveling politician; "but," repeats the fat office-holder, who, having belonged to every party and betrayed each in turn, and, always upon the crest of the wave of popular passion, never had and never expects to have clothes to his back or food for his stomach not paid for out of the public Treasury; "but," exclaim the hordes of contractors, pay-masters, Army sutlers, and petty officials; "but slavery is the cause of the war, and it will not answer to have peace and union and national life again without destroying this cause." Like a thousand other things popularly repeated as truisms, this is false. Slavery is not the cause of the war. The North was opposed to slavery, and in the North there was none. The South desired slavery, and the South had it. The slaves themselves were quiet. Even now, hearing the notes of the Union trumpet and seeing the flash of Union cannon, three million slaves, guarded by old men, women, and children alone, utter no sound of discontent, and prefer slavery to one blow for freedom. Politicians are the cause of the war, politicians North and South; who, unable or unwilling to win office and power by honest means, have sought them by fomenting sectional jealousies and factions. To their aid came the pulpit, which in the South taught the divine right of human bondage, and in the North the Christian duty of cutting slaveholders' throats. Slavery was the effect, but was no more the cause than property is the cause of robbery or life the cause of murder.
